PATNA HIGH COURT.
APPEAL FROM APPELLATE ORDER NO. 254
OF 1916.

April 16, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Chapman and Mr. Justice Jwala Prasad.

LALJI SINGH—DECREE-HOLDER—APPELLANT

GIRJA PRASAD SINGH AND OTHERS—
JUDGMENT-DEBTORS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 2—Decree, adjustment of—Decree-holder, right of, to release some or all judgment-debtors from liability.

Under Order XXI, rule 2 of the Civil Procedure Code, a decree-holder and his judgment-debtor can adjust their respective rights and liabilities in regard to the decree in any manner agreed upon by them, including the discharge of the judgment-debtor. [p. 1, col. 2]

There is nothing in Order XXI, rule 2, or any other provision of the Civil Procedure Code to prevent the release by the decree-holder of some of the judgment-debtors from their liability under the decree. [p. 2, col. 1.]

Appeal from an order of the District Judge, Monghyr, dated the 29th July 1916.

Mr. Sivanandan Rai, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Ganesh Dutta Singh, Atul Krishna Roy and Jugernath Persad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—This is an appeal by the transferee of a decree for Rs. 2,200 against certain judgment-debtors including the respondents in this case. The decree was transferred in favour of the appellant on 27th August 1905. On December 2nd, 1905, the decree-holder filed a petition of satisfaction to the extent of Rs. 275 out of the decretal amount as having been received from the respondents. In that petition the decree-holder absolved the respondents from the liability of the decree. The payment of the aforesaid Rs. 275 as well as the discharge of the respondents were duly recorded by the Court under Order XXI, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant executed the decree, ignoring the adjustment and the discharge mentioned above. The judgment-debtors-respondents objected to the execution of the decree as against them. The lower Appellate Court has upheld their objection and has disallowed the execution of the decree against them. The transferee of the decree has appealed to this Court

It is contended on behalf of the transferee that the release of the respondents from the liability of the decree amounts to varying the terms of the decree and is invalid in law. No authority directly applicable to this contention of the appellant has been shown to us. The two authorities reported as Kelu Nair v. Meenakshi (1) and Ladd Govindoss v. Ramdass Vishnadoss (2), do not apply at all to the facts of this case. In the latter case facts even have not been fully stated. In my opinion the terms of the decree have not in any way been altered by the petition of satisfaction referred to above, nor does the petition contravene any provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. In my opinion under Order XXI, rule 2, the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor can very well adjust their respective rights and liabilities in regard to the decree in any manner agreed upon by them, including the discharge of the judgment-debtor.

The learned Vakil for the appellant then contended that it is not competent for the decree-holder to release some of the judgment-debtors from the liability of the decree, which was against all the judgment-debtors jointly including the judgment-debtors released. There is nothing in Order XXI, rule 2, or any other provision of the Code of Civil Procedure to prevent the release by the decree holder of some of the judgment-debtors from the liability under the decree. The decree is being executed by the assignee of the decree-holder and the judgment-debtors can very well rely upon the release and discharge given by the decree-holder. The question raised by the appellant is one that really concerns the rights and obligations of the judgment-debtors inter se. I, therefore, agree with the view of the Court below and dismiss the appeal with costs.

CHAPMAN, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

RESPONDENTS IN F. A. No. 412 OF 1914.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Joint family—Alienation—Necessity—Debt incurred by managing members—Liability of family—Decree, setting aside of, for fraud—Irregularity in initial procedure, effect of—Jurisdiction—Objection, when to be taken—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXII, r. 4 (3)—Minor—Guardian ad litem.

Where a debt is contracted on behalf of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara Law by its managing member or members and it is proved that the debt was contracted for the benefit of the joint family, any judgment obtained against such managing member or members in respect of such debt is binding upon all the members, adults and minors, and the joint property of the family is liable for the satisfaction and discharge of the same. [p. 12, col. 1.]

Where in a case which a Court is competent to try, the parties, without objection, join issue and go to trial upon the merits, the defendant cannot subsequently dispute the jurisdiction of the Court upon the ground that there were irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to dismissal of the suit. [p. 9, col. 2.]

Ledgard v. Bull, 9 A. 191; 13 I. A. 134; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 741; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 561 (P. C.), followed.

The jurisdiction to impugn a previous decree on the ground of fraud is established law. But such jurisdiction should be exercised with care and reserve and proof must be required that there was actual and positive fraud, that is, a meditated and intentional contrivance to keep the parties and the Court in ignorance of the real facts of the case and a decree obtained by that contrivance. [p. 10, col. 2; p. 11, col. 1.]

The provisions of rule 4 (3) of Order XXXII of the Civil Procedure Code are mandatory and imperative in their nature and it would amount to want of jurisdiction in the Court to appoint a guardian ad litem on behalf of a minor without his consent. [p. 11, col. 2.]

Appeals from the decision of the Sub-Judge, first Court, Arrahs Shahabad.

Messrs. P. R. Dass, Kulwant Sahai and Parmeshwar Dayal, for the Appellants.

Mr. Sushil Madhav Mullick, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—These two first appeals arise from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Arrah, dated the 29th of May 1914. Appeal No. 313 has reference to Original Suit No. 168 of 1912; and Appeal No. 412 is concerned with Original Suit No. 169 of 1912. The plaintiffs in both these suits are members of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law residing within the district of Shahabad in this Province. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 168, i. e., the respondents in First Appeal No. 313 of 1914, are the adult members of this joint Hindu family; and the plaintiffs in Suit No. 169, who are the respondents in First Appeal No. 412 are the minor members of the same Hindu family. This Hindu family appear to have been the maliks or proprietors of four separate denominations of land; viz., the real estate or properties known as Mangraon, Sangraon, Ismailpur and Sonsarpur and in respect of which they used to pay a revenue rent to the Government. They were also owners of another denomination of land known as Pankipur which is in reality part of the Mangraon Estate. The ancestors of these plaintiffs, on the 19th of June 1887, made a usufructuary mortgage of the lands of Sangraon to one Abdul Ghani to secure a loan of Rs. 25,000. Abdul Ghani in pursuance of that mortgage, entered into possession of this property. Subsequently, on the 25th of November the plaintiffs or some of their ancestors entered into another mortgage-bond with the same Abdul Ghani to secure an advance of Rs. 5,000. This latter charge was a simple mortgage-bond. No question arises as to the validity of these mortgages.

Abdul Ghani was desirous of realizing the amount due on the simple mortgage-bond of the year 1889, and he instituted a suit to recover the principal sum advanced with interest; and he obtained a decree, ex parte, against the plaintiffs on foot of this mortgage-bond in the year 1903. It is significant to note in this connection that the plaintiffs also endeavoured to have the ex parte decree, which was obtained by Abdul Ghani, set aside upon the same ground as they now seek to have the ex parte decree obtained by defendant No. 1 set aside. The plaintiffs were successful in their attempt to have the ex parte decree obtained by Abdul Ghani set aside; and on the 27th of July 1908 the High Court of Calcutta set aside the decree obtained by Abdul Ghani; but on condition that the plaintiffs should pay to Abdul Ghani the sum of Rs. 15,904-5-4 by way of principal and interest due on foot of the simple mortgage-bond.

The plaintiffs at the same time also embarked upon a redemption suit to ascertain what was due to Abdul Ghani on the usufructuary mortgage of the 19th of June 1887 and after a considerable time it was ascertained, on the 19th of March 1909, that the amount due by the plaintiffs to Abdul Ghani in the redemption suit on foot of the usufructuary mortgage was Rs. 71,116-7-3. In the month of March 1909 the plaintiffs were in very low water, financially, and they were anxious to pay off Abdul Ghani the amount due on foot of the decree of the 27th of July 1908, decreed by the Calcutta High Court, together with whatever sum was due in the redemption suit. Accordingly early in March 1909 the plaintiffs obtained an introduction to the predecessor-in-title of defendant No. 1, referred to in these proceedings as the Pundit, who was a resident of the United Provinces, and who was, at that time, on a visit to Arrah; and the adult plaintiffs induced the Pundit to agree to advance to them and their family to discharge a pressing necessity the sum of Rs. 40,000, Rs. 15,904-5-4 of which was to be paid immediately in full discharge and satisfaction of the debt due on the simple mortgage-bond to Abdul Ghani; and the balance, Rs. 24,000 odd, was to be retained by the Pundit in his own hands until it had been ascertained exactly what was the amount due in respect of the redemption suit, or what sum Abdul Ghani would take by way of compromise to satisfy his claim in that suit. The plaintiffs, it is alleged, represented to the Pundit that although the redemption decree was for Rs. 71,000, nevertheless Abdul Ghani would accept a sum far less in satisfaction of both decrees, and they believed that it would not exceed in all the sum of Rs. 40,000. The plaintiffs are further alleged to have represented that if more money was necessary than the sum agreed to be advanced by the Pundit that they, the plaintiffs, would procure same and thus discharge the debt due to Abdul Ghani immediately and release the lands from all claims; and incidentally, the plaintiffs also represented that there were no other charges by way of mortgage upon the properties in suit. In so far as this latter representation made by the plaintiff is concerned it was subsequently discovered to be false; as the Pundit ascertained that there was a mortgage due to another person for the sum of Rs. 4,000 which the Pundit had subsequently to redeem. The Pundit agreed to advance to the plaintiffs the sum of Rs. 40,000 on the condition that he was to get an usufructuary mortgage of the properties of Sangraon and Mangraon; and that as collateral security he was also to have a simple mortgage in respect of all the four properties mentioned. And there was a further agreement that in the event of the Pundit's not getting possession of the properties contracted to be given to him under the usufructuary mortgage, that then he should be repaid the whole of the principal of Rs. 40,000 by June 1920 with interest at 12 per cent., i.e., 3 per cent. over and above the rate contracted to be paid if the agreement as to usufructuary mortgage became fully accomplished and completed. The original interest agreed upon was 9 per cent., but the Pundit stipulated that if he did not get possession, then the interest should be increased, until the whole of the principal sum advanced by him should have been repaid.

The contract, in the terms set out by me above, was embodied in a mortgage-deed, dated the 24th of March 1909. I have given a summary of the terms of the contract; save as to one provision contained in clause 14, to the effect that if the sum of Rs. 40,000 should prove insufficient to discharge and satisfy the money due to Abdul Ghani in full, that then the plaintiffs in these suits would make up the deficiency necessary out of their own pockets and would deliver clear possession to the Pundit of the lands of Mangraon and Sangraon agreed to be given to him in usufructuary mortgage.

There is no doubt that the Pundit was very anxious to enter into possession of these properties. From the moment the mortgage was executed by the plaintiffs he was pressing—and pressing strongly—that they should discharge the obligation due to Abdul Ghani under the contract which the plaintiffs had made with him, and should secure the release of the properties from all claims, and give him (the Pundit) clear possession.

The contract was executed by all the plaintiffs who were adult members of the family; and also by plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 3 in First Appeal No. 412. The other members, who are minors, did not execute the mortgage in question.

The object and purpose for which the contract and the mortgage-bond were made by the plaintiffs in favour of the Pundit was to raise money for a family necessity, for the purpose of discharging a debt which involved the risk of the whole of the joint family property being put up for sale and their rights therein extinguished for ever, and the obligation so contracted was consequently a debt binding the property and interests of all the members of the joint family.

The Pundit, finding that the plaintiffs were unwilling to pay up Abdul Ghani the amount due on the redemption decree, on the ground that the amount found to be due by the decree was excessive, induced them, the plaintiffs, in May 1909 to appeal to the Calcutta High Court against the redemption decree sanctioned by the Subordinate Judge, and that appeal was successful in the year 1915 and the amount of the decree was reduced to the sum of Rs. 31,000. From that order of the Calcutta High Court Abdul Ghani has appealed to the Privy Council; and the Pundit and his representatives have never got possession of the lands contracted to be given to him in usufructuary mortgage.

Finding it impossible to get possession or to induce the plaintiffs to perform their part of the contract by raising more money to satisfy Abdul Ghani's claim and deliver clear possession to defendant No. 1, or to his predecessor-in-title, the Pundit or rather defendant No. 1 brought a suit in October 1909 seeking to recover judgment for the amount of Rs. 15,904 odd, which he or his predecessor-in-title had admittedly paid to satisfy Abdul Ghani's claim in the suit on foot of the simple mortgage-bond. That money was paid and applied to the discharge of Abdul Ghani's claim against the plaintiffs in the present suits. Abdul Ghani's claim, which had crystallized into a form of a decree, constituted a pressing family necessity binding on the plaintiffs and all the members of the joint family, and the money which was borrowed by the plaintiffs from the Pundit to discharge that pressing necessity was a debt binding in all equity and good conscience upon the entire joint Hindu family and of which the plaintiffs in these two suits constituted the entire and exclusive members.

Prior to instituting his suit, defendant No. 1, who was the plaintiff in the former suit, served the present plaintiffs with a notice dated the 16th of September 1909 requiring them within 15 days to give him (defendant No. 10) clear possession of the property contracted to be given to him by the mortgage-deed; and stating that if they did not comply with the requirements of the notice, he (defendant No. 1) would be forced to seek the protection of the law. Upon the plaintiffs failing to comply with the requirements of the notice as stated, the defendant No. 1 instituted a suit based on the allegation that he had been induced to contract to lend Rs. 40,000 by reason of the plaintiffs' misrepresentation and fraud. The notice was admittedly served and admittedly received by the plaintiffs; because it was proved that defendant No. 10 in the former suit came, on receipt of that notice, to the Pundit and said: 'we are sorry we cannot give you possession of all the lands at present; will you kindly take possession of a part only until such time as we are able to give you the rest of the property discharged from Ghani's claim?' Therefore, it may be taken as conclusively proved that the notice of the 16th of September 1909 was duly and properly served upon the plaintiffs in these suits and was received by them.

On the 11th of October 1909 the plaint in the former suit was filed. Defendant No. 1 in this action instituted proceedings against the plaintiffs in these two appeals as defendants, and all the members of the joint Hindu family were named as parties. Five of these were minors, and the remaining members were adults. The plaint was served on the 11th of October 1909. There was no appearance on behalf of the present plaintiffs, who were defendants in that suit; and by reason of default in appearance a decree for Rs. 16,98-10-0 was obtained by defendant No. 1 in that suit against all the members of the joint Hindu family on the 3rd of December 1909. Immediately following the obtaining of that decree, defendant No. 1 took steps forthwith to execute the decree; and in January 1910 execution proceedings were commenced, and all necessary steps were taken to execute the decree which defendant No. 1 had obtained ex parte. Notices of attachment of the property to be sold pursuant to the decree are alleged to have been duly served upon the defendants in that suit; and the property was duly attached on the 10th of March 1910; and notices to assess the value of the property to be sold were also alleged to have been served upon them. In the absence of any objection on the part of the defendants in that suit the property was advertised for sale on the 6th of June 1910. The property attached, namely, Mauzas Mangraon, Sangraon, Ismailpur and Sansarpur, was put up for sale and was purchased on the 6th of June 1910 by the defendant No. 1, the decree-holder himself, for the sum of Rs. 15,450, being a sum less than the amount actually due on foot of the ex parte decree of the 3rd of December 1909. As I have pointed out, the Pundit's claim was for the amount actually advanced by him, viz., Rs. 15,904 together with interest due to him thereon at 12 per cent., making in all Rs. 16,000 odd. The defendant No. 1. could not, and did not, claim to recover the full sum of Rs. 40,000 which was contracted or agreed to be advanced on foot of the mortgage of the 24th of March 1909. The amount realized by the sale was Rs. 15,450. Thus there was a deficit of about Rs. 1,498-10-0 between the sale price and the amount due under the ex parte decree. But in the course of the sale, it was discovered that there was another incumbrancer on the property sold to defendant No. 1 who was not mentioned at all at any stage of the proceedings by the present plaintiffs; and the Pundit had to discharge the debt due to that incumbrancer, viz., Rs. 4,000 which brought the Pundit's claim, after crediting realization of the sale-proceeds, to Rs. 5,498-10-0 as the amount of the deficit due on foot of the decree. Matters proceeded and on the 27th of August 1910 the Court gave the Pundit symbolical possession of the property which was sold in pursuance of the ex parte decree. Abdul Ghani, however, was in possession of the lands of Sangraon pending the adjustment of his claim in the redemption suit.

The next step to notice is that immediately after defendant No. 1, as purchaser, had acquired possession of the property under the Court sale, he took steps as against the plaintiffs in these suits for the recovery of the amount due by way of deficit, amounting to about Rs. 5,498-10-0, seeking to make them personally liable for the amount of the deficit. Proceedings were instituted under section 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act by the Pundit against the plaintiffs on the basis that the decree obtained by him was a valid and binding decree; and on the assumption that the plaintiffs were aware and had knowledge of the existence of the ex parte decree which, it must be presumed, had been validly obtained. In January 1911 the plaintiffs compromised with the Pundit, in so far as the Pundit was seeking an order against them under section 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act to satisfy the undischarged deficit due on foot of the ex parte decree.

The next step taken was that on the 2nd of December 1912 these actions were launched by the plaintiffs to set aside the decree procured by the Pundit on the 3rd of December 1909 exactly 3 years but one day after the decree was obtained; and the ground on which it is sought to set aside the decree is that it was procured by fraud, the fraud alleged being suppression of notices and filing of false returns.

The learned Judge who tried the case has found as a fact that there was suppression of service of notices, and that the returns of service filed were false returns; and he has found as a fact that there was fraud practised in the procuring of the decree. In the face of this finding of fraud, it is quite impossible to understand how the learned Subordinate Judge made the order he did, requiring the plaintiffs to pay to defendant No. 1 the amount the Subordinate Judge ascertained to be properly due to defendant No. 1 as a condition to setting aside the ex parte decree which the Judge found as a fact had been procured by fraud.

No doubt it is always difficult for a Court of Appeal to differ from any Judge who hears and sees the witnesses who have been examined, and who has the best opportunity of measuring the degree of credit to be attached to their testimony: but in this case I feel that there are ample and sufficient reasons why we should depart from this general principle and reverse the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge on the question of fraud; and I have little hesitation in doing so.

Let us examine, step by step, the allegations of fraud relied upon. The first is that the plaint was never served; and that the return of service that was made by the peon was a false and incorrect return. Mr. Mullick on behalf of the respondents now alleges that the plaintiff in the former suit, in conjunction with the identifier, conspired to procure this false return to be filed. Let us see what is the evidence relied upon to support this startling charge. The main ground put forward in support of the charge is that the identifier, Hariramji, was not called as a witness although present in Court. At first blush I was inclined to attach great weight, in support of the charge of fraud, to the fact that the identifier, who was supposed to have identified the persons who were served, although present in Court, was not called to prove the identification of the persons on whom the summons was served. But I think that although it was a grave error on the part of the legal advisers of the Pundit not to have called the identifier, there are sufficient reasons to explain why he was not called; or at least to destroy the impression that on account of the identifier not being called one would be entitled to infer, or justified in inferring, under the circumstances that the whole proceeding connected with the service of the summons was fraudulent or dishonest.

The second ground relied on in support of the contention that the summons was not served is that the two witnesses, alleged to have been present when the summons was served as stated in column 3 of the return made by the peon, were called and denied the allegation contained in the peon's return that they were present when the summons was served. These two persons, Dulip Dusadh Chowkidar and Ramgobind Chamar, are inhabitants of Mangraon and intimately connected with the plaintiffs, and it is only natural that they should endeavour to serve the interests of the plaintiffs rather than assist the defendant who was an utter stranger in support of his case. The evidence of Dulip Dusadh witness No. 3 for the plaintiffs and Ramgobind witness No. 9 for the same party does not appear to me on its face to be honest or sincere; on the contrary it is stamped with falsity and exaggeration in addition to being contradictory and unreliable.

But a short answer to these two points seems to be that the plaintiffs themselves have not come forward to depose that they were not served with the plaint. None of the plaintiffs, except two, came forward to swear that they were not served with summons; while on the other hand there is documentary evidence to show that they were served; and the evidence which shows that they were served has not been rebutted or impeached.

The next point that is alleged in proof of non service of summons is that one Basudeo Pande, who was present when one of the plaintiffs Ramnares Rai was served with the summons and who in writing acknowledged receipt of the summons on behalf of this plaintiff, was not called. I do not know why he was not called. If the plaintiffs were anxious to establish that he was not there they could and should have called him, but they did not do so.

The fourth and last ground on which it is sought to prove that the summons was not served is the discrepancy in the details given in the peon's return as compared with those set forth in the identifier's affidavit:—namely, the peon reported that he served the summons by affixing it to the walls of two houses one facing North and the other facing West; whereas the identifier in his affidavit says that the notices were fixed to one house only and that facing East. I think that the discrepancy in the identifier's affidavit with the peon's report may be excused in this case by the fact, which is not denied, that the identifier knew very little of this Province; that he comes from the United Provinces, and that he was not primarily concerned with the surroundings or situation of the property to which the summons had been affixed but with the identification of the persons to be served with the summons.

Now these are the grounds and reasons upon which we are asked to hold that there was fraudulent suppression of service of the summons in the former suit on the plaintiffs in the present suits, and the filing of false returns. The peon was called by the Pundit's legal advisers and he proved the service as stated in his return; but the plaintiffs have deliberately held themselves back, and have refrained from giving any evidence to prove that they were not served with the summons as alleged by the peon. One of the plaintiffs, namely original defendant No. 10, was called but he says nothing about it. Another, original defendant No. 15, was also called but not one word was asked of him as to whether he was served with summons or the plaint or not. He was only asked his age, viz., whether he was a minor or whether he was a major. But what does appear to me to be of great importance in this aspect of the case is the evidence of Ramsaran Lal the Pleader, witness No. 12, who was examined for the defence. It is not suggested that he was in conspiracy with defendant No. 1. or with his identifier or with the peon. His evidence has not been impeached or challenged in any one respect. He is a respectable gentleman practising as a Pleader in the Court at Arrah, and there is no reason to doubt that the evidence given by him is genuine and reliable; and once we accept and believe his evidence, as we do, the plaintiffs' case is established to be transparently false—false from start to finish. The learned Judge who tried the case finds that this witness, Ramsaran Lal, is a truthful and reliable witness; and what does the witness say? At page 154 of the paper-book this witness says: "I had nothing to do with the service of processes in the locality. I have personal knowledge of the service of processes. After the service of summons Deoki and Brij Mohan came to me, and said that they were respectable men and the suit would ruin them, and that hearing of that suit other creditors might bring suits." Is that not an admission by at least two members of the plaintiffs' family that they had been served with the summons; and that they begged of this Pleader to save their respectability and honour because they were apprehensive that this suit might induce other creditors to bring other suits against them? This witness, as I have said, is a truthful witness; and on this point touching service of summons, irrespective of other matters, we accept his evidence as trustworthy. Therefore, we hold that the summons and the plaint were duly served; and that the discrepancy between the peon's report and the identifier's affidavit does not outweigh or discredit the evidence and value of this Pleader's testimony; more especially as none of the plaintiffs have come forward to prove that they were not served, which was the foundation of their case, and their right to the relief they seek. Therefore, we hold the present plaintiffs were duly and properly served with the summons in the former suit instituted by the defendant No. 1 and their case must fail on that ground.

Secondly, it is alleged in support of the plaintiffs' case that the notice nominating guardians of the minors was not duly served. However, one is inclined to view this ground of alleged fraud with suspicion, when the main case put forward as to non-service of the summons or plaint has failed and utterly broken down.

The ground put forward in support of this contention is that the identifier who identified the persons to be served was not called. However, the peon's report satisfies us that the notice nominating the guardians of the minors was duly served.

The third process, the service of which is alleged to have been suppressed, is the notice to assess the valuation of the property to be sold. Here again the main allegation relied on is the fact that Hariramji, the identifier, was not called to prove identification of the persons served with the notice. Again, the three witnesses who were alleged to have been present at the time of service of notice have been called by the plaintiffs; and they say that they were not present when the service of notice was alleged to have been effected. These three persons are residents of Mangraon and probably tenants of, or connected in some way or other with, the plaintiffs: and there are very good reasons to suggest why they should be friendly disposed towards the plaintiffs as against the defendant who is a stranger to this Province. However, the evidence of these witnesses, who are the same persons as were called to prove non-service of the summons or plaint, is in my opinion utterly lacking in conviction, or certainly that their evidence is true or reliable. If the fact was, as alleged, that there was a conspiracy between defendant No. 1 and his servants to effect false service of all processes in the suit, surely the conspirators would not have named persons as being present at the time of service when they were not there at all. A conspiracy so designed would be a clumsy proceeding easily capable of being detected.

Much capital is made of the fact that one person is wrongly named as being present at time of service in the peon's report. There is a man with a slightly different name somewhat like the name given in the report, known as Bedaisi Bhar: and he is called. He deposes that there is no man by the name of Bindeswari Bhar (the name given in the return) in the village; and that if the person named in the return has reference to himself, he was not present when the notice was served.

Much capital is also made out of the use by the peon of the words, zemindari kachahri; because the witness No. 13 for the defence who followed the peon deposes that in this particular village of Mangraon there is no zemindari kachahri at all. We are asked to infer from these facts that the peon is lying when he makes the statement that he wrote his report in the zemindari kachahri after serving the notice. But assuming that this statement was erroneous, the question is, did the peon make this statement fraudulently and in the interest of defendant No. 1 who was the plaintiff in that suit; and did the plaintiff know that he (the peon) was fraudulently acting in making a wrong entry as to the place where he filled in the report and the persons upon whom he served the notice. The peon's report may have been irregular, but did the defendant No. 1 know and induce the peon to file a false report and return as to service? The onus of proving this lay heavily upon the plaintiffs in these suits, which onus they have completely failed to discharge.

The next ground urged in support of fraud is that the manner in which the notices attaching the property to be sold were served was altogether wrong, viz., that there were five properties to be attached but only four notices are alleged to have been served and that, therefore, the attachment and sale held pursuant thereto are illegal and not according to law. However, this argument is misconceived, as there were only four and not five properties attached; inasmuch as Pankipur forms part of Mangraon. It is stated that notices of attachment were served by affixing same to a pepal tree in one of the villages attached. This may have been an irregular method of service; but was it fraudulent? I have little doubt that all the plaintiffs well knew, as their subsequent conduct shows, that the notices of attachment had been affixed to the peepal tree. If, however, these notices had been irregularly served, the illegality affecting the question of service could have been dealt with under the provisions of Order XXI, rule 90, of the Code of Civil Procedure and the sale set aside. But the plaintiffs refrained from taking any steps under that order to impeach the sale on the ground of irregularity; but they seek now to rely on the alleged irregularity to support a substantive charge of fraud.

It is urged that the service of all notices was suppressed and that false returns were filed. This is the main ground upon which the plaintiffs seek to set aside the ex parte decree of the 3rd of December 1909 on the ground of fraud.

Let us look at the evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant to rebut the allegation of fraud put forward by the plaintiffs. I have dealt with the evidence of the Pleader. I think that it conclusively established that the summons or plaint was served. But apart from that evidence there are other circumstances in this case which support that view.

The defendant's claim was a claim for money, undoubtedly advanced by him to the plaintiffs or for their benefit. No doubt clause 6 of the mortgage-bond might be considered to suggest that the defendant No. 1 was not justified in bringing the suit at the time he did; that he should have postponed bringing his action even though he did not get possession of the mortgaged property until June 1910; and that he had no cause of action at the time, and that, therefore, the suit was not maintainable. We have considered that aspect of the case, and we think that the plaintiffs are not entitled to raise this point now, although it might have been quite a good ground of defence to urge at the trial; and the Trial Judge would then have been bound to consider it. I think the law on this point is very clearly laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in a case reported as Ledgard v.

Bull (1). Their Lordships say: "But there are numerous authorities which establish that when, in a cause which the Judge is competent to try, the parties without objection join issue and go to trial upon the merits, the defendant cannot subsequently dispute his jurisdiction upon the grounds that there were irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to the dismissal of the suit." Thus if the plaintiffs in the present suits, who as we have held were duly served with the summons or plaint, had raised the point that the claim of the plaintiff in the former suit was not ripe, it might have been incumbent upon the learned Judge who tried the suit to reject the plaint in that action; but having held back and having abstained from taking part in the proceedings and allowed issues to be framed, the trial to proceed and judgment to be obtained against them, and the debt having in consequence merged into the decree, it is not competent for the plaintiffs now to say that the Judge had no jurisdiction to try the suit. But irrespective of this contention there are other reasons for holding that the amount due was properly recoverable at the time that the suit was brought. Defendant No. 1's claim in the former suit is an honest claim for money paid by him for the benefit and on behalf of the plaintiffs. Moreover the plaintiff in the former suit, i. e., the Pundit, on the 16th of September 1909, demanded the fulfilment of the defendants' (i. e., the present plaintiffs') part of the contract, by giving him (the Pundit) clear possession of the mortgaged property; and in default the Pundit held out the threat that he would be compelled to institute legal proceedings against them. Admittedly this notice of the 16th of September 1909 was served, this is not denied. The plaintiffs must have been aware that proceedings had been taken against them by the defendant No. 1 pursuant to the notice of the 16th September 1910; and that there had been symbolical possession given of the property purchased under the Court; because from August 1910 onwards these plaintiffs never paid one pice in discharge of Government demands by way of revenue or cesses, etc., although admittedly these charges fell due quarter by quarter for two years and three months after the 6th June 1910 when the sale was effected and the 2nd of December 1912 when this suit was instituted. During these two years and three months these plaintiffs must have known very well that they were not paying anything towards Government demands in respect of this property. Who did they think was paying the Government revenue during this period? One is irresistibly led to the conclusion that the plaintiffs must have known that it was the defendant No. 1 who was discharging these claims as auction-purchaser of the property. Furthermore defendant No. 1, immediately after getting possession on the 27th of August 1910, proceeded by way of execution against the plaintiffs personally to take steps to realize the balance due on foot of the decree, which amounted to Rs. 5,498-10 0, and the plaintiffs compromised with him on the basis that he was making a valid claim on foot of the decree he was seeking to execute. The defendant in this action relies strongly upon the compromise effected in the proceedings under section 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act for the purpose of showing that he was recognised by these plaintiffs as having a valid title under the decree; and he asks us to come to the conclusion or draw the inference that the plaintiffs' laches in seeking redress negatives the idea that these plaintiffs are now bona fide claiming relief against a wrong fraudulently done to them by defendant No. 1. For three years all but one day they took no step whatsoever to challenge or impeach the decree of the 3rd December 1909. For two years and three months from the time that defendant No. 1, as purchaser, took possession of the plaintiffs' property they took no steps to pay the Government revenue, or to enquire who was discharging the obligations primarily imposed on them. The law likes a man who has been wronged to seek redress at the earliest possible moment and lay bare his claim openly and candidly; and not, as in this case, to allow time to lapse and then come forward and seek to set aside a decree on the ground of fraud. If such a person hangs back, and refrains from taking action, with knowledge of the wrong alleged to have been done to him, he cannot complain that the bona fides of his claim should be viewed with suspicion. The fraud alleged in this case mainly is the suppression of the service of notices; and yet not one of the plaintiffs have come to the box to give any evidence in respect of the non-service of the summons or notices, or to offer any evidence concerning any matter connected therewith. It is perfectly certain having regard to the frame of the suit that the plaintiffs were not bound to apply for redress under Order IX, rule 13, of the Code of Civil Procedure. If their case had been confined merely to non-service of the summons, then they would be bound to apply under Order IX, rule 13; and no action would have been maintainable independent of the summary remedy provided by the rules of the Code. But that is not their case. It is a case in which fraud is alleged in the procuring of the decree; and it has been held in the cases to which I shall refer that where fraud is alleged in the procuring of a decree the parties may institute a suit for fraud independent of the provisions of Order IX, rule 13. The cases reported as Pran Nath Roy v. Mohesh Chandio Moitra (2), Ram Narain Tewari v. Shew Bhunjan Roy (3) and Nanda Kumar Howladar v. Ram Jiban Howladar (4) all establish this. But the learned Chief Justice Sir Lawrence Jenkins says that "The jurisdiction to impugn a previous decree for fraud is beyond question.... But it is a jurisdiction to be exercised with care and reserve," otherwise there would be no finality in legal proceedings and judgments of the Court would be rendered vague and uncertain and the administration of the law might readily be converted from an instrument of justice into an instrument of grave oppression; as I think the plaintiffs in this case are trying to make it. The plaintiffs have alleged fraud; I think that they must be required to give proof that there was actual and positive fraud on the part of the plaintiff in the former suit, namely, "a meditated and intentional contrivance to keep the parties and the Court in ignorance of the real facts of the case, and obtaining a decree by that contrivance," Patch v. Ward (5) lays down the standard of fraud necessary to be established in such cases. And the nature of proof that is required to be given is stated in the decision reported as Kunwar Bahadur v. Bindraban (6). We have considered the argument addressed to us on behalf of the plaintiffs very fully and with the greatest care and we come to the conclusion that on the established fact the plaintiffs are not entitled to succeed.

Other questions have been raised in this case, but the main question addressed to us was the question of fraud with which we have dealt so fully. We think it is necessary to deal briefly with the other points. It is necessary to consider the argument addressed to us on behalf of the minors. It is contended by Mr. Mullick on behalf of the minor plaintiffs in Appeal No. 42 of 1914 that the decree obtained on the 3rd of December 1909 is not valid or binding on them because the minor plaintiffs were named as defendants in the former suit, inasmuch as they were not properly represented in the course of the proceedings, and consequently that they were not parties to the action; and that, therefore, the decree was not a binding decree at least to the extent of their interest in the property in suit; and that the suit should have been dismissed as against them. Much argument has been addressed to us by learned Counsel on the question of the propriety and legality of joining the minors as defendants in the former proceedings. It was contended by Mr. Mullick that the nominated guardians of the minors had not been properly appointed under the provisions of the rules and orders of the Code of Civil Procedure. It appears that on the 11th October 1909, after the summons and the plaint had been served defendant No. 1, who was the plaintiff in that suit, nominated, as he was entitled to do, certain persons as guardians of the minors and he caused notices to be served on these persons of their nomination requiring them to act as the guardians of the minors and stating that in default the Court would appoint some other fit and proper person to represent the minors. The persons upon whom the notices had been served, namely, Har Prasad Rai and Kali Charan Rai, defendants in the suit, were requested to express their willingness to act as guardians by the 24th November 1909 and to state if they accepted the responsibility of action as guardians of the persons named, namely, defendants Nos. 4, 5 and 10. The nominated guardians filed no answer to the notice served on them; and on the 3rd of December when the case came on for final disposal the defendant No. 1 applied to the Judge to appoint Har Prasad Rai and Kali Charan as the guardians of the three minors named; and the learned Judge, without receiving the assent of these persons, upon whom the notices had been served, added them as defendants and guardians of the minors in the suit. We think that the procedure adopted by the learned Judge in so adding these persons as guardians without their assent was without jurisdiction. Order XXXII, rule 4, sub-rule 2, provides that "No person shall without his consent be appointed guardian for the suit." It is now clear that no person can be appointed as guardian on behalf of a minor without his consent. This Order is mandatory and imperative in its nature; and it is quite clear that it would amount to nothing short of want of jurisdiction in the Court to appoint such a person without his consent. We adopt the law which we think was accurately laid down in the cases reported as Dinabandhu Nandi v. Mashuda Khatun (7) and Talukraj Koer v. Choolachooa Koer (8). The Orders of the Code of Civil Procedure which apply to this case are Order XXXII, rule 3, sub-rule 4; and rule 4, sub-rule 3. Mr. Dass who appears on behalf of the defendant relies strongly upon the decision of the Privy Council reported as Walian v. Banke Behari Pershad Singh (9). But I do not think that their Lordships of the Privy Council in that case went or intended to go so far as Mr. Dass endeavoured to argue before us; but it appears to us that the facts of the present case are different from the facts of the case reported as Walian v. Banke Behari Pershad Singh (9) and having regard to the particular facts of the case before us and to the recent changes in the law as to the appointment of guardians of minors enacted by the Legislature since the decision of the Privy Council in the case reported as Walian v. Banke Behari Pershad Singh (9), we hold that the minor defendants in the former suit were not "effectively represented" and that consequently they were not parties to the suit.

However, at the last moment in reply Mr. Dass for the appellant for the first time suggested that it was a matter of indifference whether the minors were made parties or not as defendants in the former suit; and that even if we held that the minors were not parties to the suit he is entitled nevertheless to maintain the decree in toto not only as against the adult plaintiffs, but also against the interests of the minor in the property in suit even though they were not joined as parties; because, he says, the defendant No. 1 admittedly advanced his money in discharge and satisfaction of a debt due by the plaintiffs for a family purpose and necessity, and that consequently all the members of the joint family, adults and minors, would be bound by any decree obtained against the family for the recovery of such a debt. This view of the law is not disputed on behalf of the plaintiffs; and the law seems now to be fairly settled that in a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law, if a debt is contracted on behalf of the family by the "karta" or managing member or members and it is proved that it was a debt contracted for the benefit of the joint family, that any judgment obtained against such managing member or members in respect of such a debt is binding upon all the members of the joint family, adults and minors, and that the joint property of all the members of the joint family is liable to satisfy and discharge the same. The authorities for this proposition are to be found in the cases reported as Musammatt Bebee Bachun v. Sheikh Hamid Hossein (10), Sheo Shankar Ram v. Jaddo Kunwar (11), Hori Lal v. Nimman Kunwar (12) and Kishen Parshad v. Har Narain Singh (13). To the same effect is the law stated by the Chief Justice of this Court in Ranjit Prasad Tewari v. Ramjatan Pandey (14). There are numerous authorities all tending to show that a decree obtained against the managing member of the joint Hindu family in respect of a debt incurred for the benefit of the joint family is binding on all the members of the family, whether adult or minors. Mr. Mullick argues that in this case the debt was not a debt contracted for a family necessity. But we are of opinion that the debt was incurred for a family necessity, as we have already pointed out in the earlier portion of our judgment; and that the decree obtained for the recovery of the same was binding on all the members of the joint family, both adult and minors. Mr. Mullick, however, further contends that the judgment and decree in this case is a personal judgment and decree against the persons named as defendants to the suit; and that inasmuch as the minors were not effectively represented and were not in consequence parties to the suit that, therefore, their interests were not affected. Well I think that this argument is also unsustainable having regard to the recent decisions reported as Sripat Singh v. Prodyot Kumar (15), which followed Mahabir Pershad v. Moheswar Nath Sahai (16).

Mr. Mullick also argues that only the right, title and interest of the adult members of the joint family was sold in pursuance of the decree and not the right, title and interest of the minors in the property in suit and that the decree was a mere money-decree against the properly represented defendants and not a decree against the joint family property or a decree in which the joint family property was liable for the discharge of the family debt. Looking to the plaint, and that is the best test, one sees that what the plaintiff in the former suit claimed was a decree as against all the members of the family and in respect of the entire joint property and what the judgment of the 3rd December in effect did grant was the relief claimed by the plaintiff in that suit.

As to the question of inadequacy of price for which the property was sold to the defendant No. 1 on the 6th of June 1910, no argument has been urged or pressed before us beyond the mere suggestion that the property was worth two-and-a-half to three lakhs of rupees and that thus by inference the sum of Rs. 15,405 was an inadequate price for a property of such considerable value. However, any real evidence as to inadequacy of price is conspicuous by its absence; and we see no reason whatever for holding on the evidence that the property in suit sold on the 6th June 1910 was sold and purchased by the defendant No. 1 for an inadequate price.

With regard to the question as to whether the minor plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 3 were estopped by their conduct from disputing the validity of the decree obtained on the 3rd of December 1909 it is unnecessary to decide having regard to our decision on the other issues in the case. I have no hesitation in saying, therefore, that the decree obtained on the 3rd of December 1909 was legally binding on the plaintiffs as a joint Hindu family and that what passed to the present defendant No. 1 as purchaser at the sale in execution of the decree was the entire joint family interest and estate in the four properties which I have mentioned, two of which have since been sold, viz., Ismailpur and Sansarpur, for arrears of Government revenue and were of little value.

We have heard this case at great length and have received considerable assistance from the Counsel for the appellant and the learned Vakil for the respondents.

We have carefully considered the arguments addressed to us on both sides and have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge dated the 29th of May 1914 decreeing the suit of the respondents in these appeals cannot stand. We accordingly set it aside and allow this appeal with costs in both Courts.

Appeal allowed.

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (XI of 1859), ss. 6, 33—Sale notification, defective, construction of—Revenue sale, annulment of—Limitation—"Ijmal," meaning of—Collector, duty of—Sale-certificate, value of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 94, 95, 96, 97—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 142.

Per Curiam (Chapman, J., dissenting).—Where a notification under section 6 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act is not sufficient in itself to tell intending purchasers what they are invited to bid for, it renders the sale void. [p. 26, col. 2; p. 34, col. 1.]

Case-law discussed.

Whenever a residuary share is advertised for sale under section 6 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act the mouzas comprising that share must be correctly described by the Collector. [p. 26, col. 2.]

Per Chapman, J.—Where a bona fide attempt has been made to describe the share or shares to be sold in the notification under section 6 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, the sale is not void but the mistakes should be treated as irregularities which may form the basis of a suit within the limitations of section 33 of the Act. [p. 20, col. 2.]

Section 33 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act provides that no sale shall be annulled by a Court except on the ground of its having been made contrary to the provisions of the Act, and that no sale shall be annulled upon such a ground unless the ground relied upon has been declared and specified in an appeal made to the Commissioner under section 25 of the Act. [p. 15, col. 1.]

The word "ijmal" is accepted in Bihar as the vernacular equivalent of the residuary share contemplated by the Revenue Sales Act. The word is never used as meaning the residue of a separate account. [p. 16, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Mullick, J.—The word "ijmal" means nothing more than "joint." It is an adjective and not the name of any particular thing or part of the estate. It is a relative term and has not even the fixity attached to the word residuary. [p. 24, col. 2.]

Where a sale notification contains defects, the Collector has no jurisdiction to amend anything in the original notification under section 6 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act. [p. 28, col. 1.]

A sale-certificate is not a certificate of title in the case of a purchaser under a sale under Act XI of 1859 and the statements contained therein are not conclusive to show what was offered to and purchased by the auction-purchaser. [p. 28, col. 1.]

Under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act the Collector is not required to specify the mauzas when selling an entire estate or a separate account, but he is required so to do when selling the residuary share. [p. 29, col. 1.]

The Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act is a complete Code in itself and is quite independent of the general law of limitation. [p. 30, col. 1.]

Therefore, when a sale is not one under the provisions of the Revenue Sales Act, a suit to set aside the sale is not affected by the provisions which require an appeal to the Commissioner but falls under Article 142 of the Limitation Act. [p. 30, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Gaya.

Messrs. Pugh, Jayaswal and Mahomed Mustafa Khan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J. — A revenue paying estate, bearing Tauzi No. 4601, was held by co-sharers. Some had opened separate accounts under the Revenue Sales Act entitling them to pay their shares of the Government revenue separately. The residuary share which remained after the opening of these separate accounts was put up for sale on account of arrears. The highest offer made at the auction did not equal the amount of the arrear due. Thereupon, the Collector stopped the sale and declared that the entire estate would be put up for sale unless the several recorded sharers or one or more of them were willing to purchase the share in arrear by paying to Government the whole arrear due. On the 15th June 1911, Nathuni Narayan Singh, one of the co-sharers, purchased the residuary share by paying the amount of revenue in arrear. Mahanth Krishna Dayal Gir, claiming to hold eight-annas shares in two villages included in the residuary share, appealed to the Commissioner against the sale. His appeal was rejected on the ground of limitation. On the 23rd of May 1912 Mahanth Krishna Dayal Gir filed the suit out of which the present appeal arises. He prayed that the sale should be set aside upon the ground that no notice under sections 6 and 7 of the Revenue Sales Act and no writ of delivery of possession were duly and legally served; and that there was no arrear of revenue due from him. He further asked the Court to hold that the sale to Nathuni Narayan and the sale-deed under which one Syed Abdul Gaffur had purchased the share from Nathuni Narayan had not conveyed the eight-annas share held by the Mahanth in the two villages above referred to. The plaintiff Mahanth's case, so far as the latter portion of his prayer is concerned, is based upon the ground that his shares in these two villages, Khaira Khurd and Sao Khurd, were omitted from the list of mouzas mentioned in the sale-certificate.

The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff had failed to prove that there were no arrears of revenue due; and had also failed to prove that the requisite notices had not been served. He, therefore, held that upon the case made in the plaint the sale could not be set aside.

Upon the question as to what passed by the sale, raised in the second portion of the plaintiff's case above referred to, he held that the entire residuary share passed, although the list of shares of mauzas comprised in the share was not complete. He also held that as there had been no appeal to the Commissioner within sixty days of the sale, the suit was barred under section 33 of the Revenue Sales Act.

The District Judge dismissed the appeal to him, upon the sole ground that the suit was barred by section 33 of the Revenue Sales Act above referred to.

The plaintiff has now appealed to this Court. He does not contend before us that he can succeed upon the ground either that no arrear of revenue was due or that the requisite notices were not served. We are, therefore, no longer concerned with either of these two points.

The first contention in appeal is that the sale should have been set aside upon the ground that the description of the property in the notification under section 6 was either insufficient or incorrect. This was not the case in the plaint but apart from that, I am of opinion that the contention must fail. Section 33 of the Act says that no sale shall be annulled by the Court except upon the ground of its having been made contrary to the provisions of this Act; and that no sale shall be annulled upon such a ground unless the ground relied upon shall have been declared and specified in an appeal made to the Commissioner under section 25 of the Act. Section 25 of the Act has now been replaced by section 2 of Act VII of 1868; that section requires that the appeal to the Commissioner shall be presented within sixty days of the sale. It is admitted in the present case that the appeal to the Commissioner was presented long after the sixty days had expired. It is clear, therefore, that there has been no appeal to the Commissioner under the section and that, therefore, a suit to set aside the sale on the ground of misdescription would be barred.

We have been asked to call in the aid of section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act, which permits a Court to entertain an appeal after time for sufficient cause. If in the present instance the Commissioner had applied section 5 and had entertained the appeal upon the statement of the appellant that he came to know of the sale for the first time within sixty days of his appeal, then possibly it might have been open to us to say that the appeal was an appeal under section 2 of Act VII of 1868. In the absence of any order by the Commissioner to that effect, I am unable to say that the appeal made to the Commissioner was an appeal under section 2 of Act VII of 1868. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that we cannot in this case go into the question whether the sale should be set aside upon the ground of any irregularity in the notifications or in the description of the property which was put up for sale.

It is significant to note that the plaint makes no mention of any defect in the notification under section 6. Nor is it alleged that the failure of the bidding resulted from any imperfection in the description of the property in the sale notification. It was necessary for the plaintiff, if he wished to succeed on this ground, to specifically state the case, first, in his appeal to the Commissioner and, secondly, in his plaint in this suit. But he did neither.

So far as the failure of the bidding is concerned, the allegation in the written statement to the effect that there was a mortgage decree due to the plaintiff himself for more than one and-a-half lakh of rupees against this residuary share is significant. It suggests that it was impossible for the plaintiff to say that the failure of the bidding was the result of misdescription, for the failure would be attributable to the existence of this mortgage decree. The suggestion is that the omission to make the case of inadequate bidding in the plaint was intentional.

I am clearly of opinion that both having regard to the provisions of section 33 and having regard to the nature of the case made in the plaint, it is not now open to us to set aside the sale upon the ground of any imperfection in the description of the property given in the sale notification.

Nor would it be possible to declare the sale a nullity on the ground of defect in the notification under section 6. The plaint makes no mention of any defect in the notification, and if it did it would not afford ground for declaring the sale a nullity.

The plaintiff can then only succeed upon the second part of his case; namely, upon the ground that his shares in the two villages mentioned in the plaint did not pass at the sale to Nathuni Narayan. To this part of his case section 33 is clearly not a bar; and the learned District Judge fell into error in summarily dismissing the entire suit. He should have determined the question raised by the plaintiff as to what passed at the sale. All the materials for the decision of this question, however, have been placed before us. The matter has been argued for two days and we propose to determine the question ourselves.

Before proceeding to enter into details of the evidence as to what passed at the sale, it is desirable to begin with a short explanation of certain matters involved.

The first point is that under the Revenue Sales Act nothing can be sold which is not a revenue-paying estate or a share in a revenue-paying estate. If there are two descriptions in the sale notification the description which purports to state the share in the revenue-paying estate will, therefore, be the dominant description.

The second point upon which some explanation is desirable is the use of the word "ijmal" in the papers I shall have to consider. Under sections 10 and 11 of the Sales Act and section 70, Land Registration Act, a sharer in a joint estate, who desires to pay his share of the revenue separately, may apply to the Collector specifying the interest held by him in the estate, and the share of the revenue payable on account of it. The Collector then causes to be made a general publication of the fact of this application; and if no objection is made by any other co-sharer, the Collector opens a separate account with the applicant and credits separately to his share all payments made by him. The residuary share of the estate after excluding these separate accounts is called the "ijmal" share. "Ijmal" is the vernacular term which represents the term residuary share. The word has for years been recognised in Bihar. The word is used in that sense in the plaint by the plaintiff himself and the meaning was not questioned before us in argument. In the case reported as Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Baijnath Ram Goenka (1) the Privy Council say "Residue, commonly called the ijmal or joint share." "Ijmal" means joint and the word means that portion of the estate, the proprietors of which remain jointly liable for the land revenue after excluding the proprietors who pay separately. "Ijmal" is a perfectly definite thing. It is the right of the proprietors who have not separated, stated in the term of a share of the Tauzi number. A purchaser of the ijmali share takes the estate and can oust every interest which is not covered by a separate account and which is not excluded for that reason under section 13 from the sale. It is important to notice two matters in this connection. The first is that Government is interested only in obtaining the revenue and is not responsible for the statements of the applications for separate accounts as to the extent of the interest held by each in the estate; and next that in an estate where several separate accounts have been opened, some in respect of specific portions of the estate under section 11, Revenue Sales Act, some in respect of shares in specific portions under section 70, Land Registration Act, 1876, and some in respect of shares in the estate held in joint tenancy, it may be difficult, even if the interests have been accurately stated, to specify in detail what the "ijmal" share consists of. It is, therefore, a very common practice to describe the interests of the proprietors who have remained jointly liable for revenue simply by the word "ijmal" (residuary share) without any specification in detail, it being understood that the proportion which the "ijmal" share bears to the entire estate is sufficiently indicated by stating the proportion of the revenue shown to be payable for the "ijmal" share. This procedure is what was originally contemplated by the Act of 1859. It has been held by the Calcutta High Court to be a sufficient compliance with the law where the separate accounts have all been opened in respect of shares of the estate held in joint tenancy: Ram Narain Koer v. Mahabir Pershad Singh (2), Dilchand Mahto v. Baijnath Singh (3), Ismail Khan v. Abdul Aziz Khan (4).

The practice has been said to be materially irregular where the separate accounts have been opened in respect of specific portions of the estate under section 11 of the Revenue Sales Act or in respect of shares in specific portions under section 70 of the Land Registration Act: Nibaran Chandra Chowdhry v. Chiranjib Prasad Bose (5).

The third matter upon which some preliminary explanation is desirable relates to the list of villages or shares in villages, which appears in the sale proclamation. The first point to notice is that the Act of 1859 does not require a village list to be given. What the Act of 1859 did require was a notice under section 13 that the separate accounts would be excluded from the sale. Originally this was done by giving the details of the separate accounts and saying they were excluded. After 1876 when more complete lists of the villages in each tauzy number had been obtained, section 13 was sometimes complied with by deducting the separate accounts from the estate list and giving a list of villages in the residuary share. The Act of 1859 could not have required village lists, for applicants for separate accounts were not required to base their applications on village lists till section 69, Act VII of 1876. It is well to remember that the revenue unit in Bengal commonly described by a tauzy number has no direct connection with any village unit. It signifies merely that a separate engagement was made in the 18th century for the payment of the land revenue in respect of the land or lands designated by the tauzy number. The tauzy number may be a piece of land partly in one village and partly in another or it may contain several villages. In 1795 and in 1800 an attempt was made to prepare lists of villages and to show which village or which portion of a village belonged to which tauzy number. This attempt proved abortive and anything like complete lists of villages were not obtained till fifty years later after the revenue survey and it was not till the Act of 1876 that an applicant for a separate account was bound to refer to the entries in the lists of villages.

The fourth matter which should be mentioned here is that it is possible for the Government to say what revenue is payable in respect of an "ijmal" share; but it is not possible to say what revenue is payable for an undivided portion of the ijmal share or to say that there were arrears of revenue due from a particular portion of the ijmal share. With these preliminary considerations in mind, I propose to deal with the details of the evidence as to what passed at the sale.

The first matter we have to consider is the notification under sections 6 and 13 of the Act. This purports to be a notification declaring that the share is to be sold. In the headings of this form, the meaning of the word "share," it must be carefully remembered, can only mean a share in the tauzy number. It cannot mean a share in any village or villages in respect of which a complete separate account has not been opened, for such a share cannot be sold under the Act. In columns 7 and 9 of this form the sudder jama of (i.e., revenue payable for) the share, and the arrears due from the share, are to be entered. As I have said, it is not possible to say what the sudder jama of an undivided portion of the ijmal share (such as a village or share of a village) is or that arrears of revenue are due from such an undivided portion. So far as the entries in columns 7 and 9 are concerned, therefore, it is impossible to say that it was intended, or that anybody understood, that anything less than the ijmal share was to be put up for sale.

Then we have the entry required by section 13 of the Act to the effect that other shares, except those stated above, will be excluded. This can only mean shares in the tauzy number other than the ijmal share and can have no reference to shares of villages in respect of which complete separate accounts have not been opened.

Then we come to column 5, the heading of which is: "If only a share is to be sold, specification of such share or shares." Again I say "share" can only mean a separate account or a residuary share. Under this heading occurs the word "ijmal" or residuary share. This word, as I have tried to show above, is a description in itself which includes and denotes the entire subject-matter. Then follows a list of some 38 villages with specification of the share in each village. In this long list the name of one of the villages, a share in which is claimed by the plaintiff, and a portion of the share claimed by him in another village are omitted. I have been asked to hold that the dominant description in this notification is this list of shares in the villages and that the word "ijmal" (residuary share) which occurs at the top of the column was not an independent description of the property but is intended to indicate merely that each of these shares of the villages which stand below is in the ijmal share, I am entirely unable to accept this contention. The contention is inconsistent with the object of the revenue sale notification. It is inconsistent with the entries in columns 7 and 9; it is inconsistent with the only possible meaning which can be attached to the word "share" in the heading of the column 5 under notice; it is inconsistent with the meaning of the word "ijmal;" and it was not the meaning which was attributed to this notification in the second paragraph of the plaint. I am equally unable to accept the other suggestion which was offered: viz, that the omission of these two villages from the long list of villages was intended to restrict the sale to the villages mentioned; and that the intention was to exclude from the sale of the ijmal the sharers in these two villages omitted. In addition to the considerations above set forth the preponderance of probability is all in favour of the omissions being due to mistake and not to intention. For preparing the list of shares in the villages in the ijmal share the Collector's Office has no statement to go upon. The village list for the ijmal share has to be arrived at by numerous deductions from the lists of shares in villages submitted by the holders of the various separate accounts and when the villages number 39 occasional mistakes will occur. It must be carefully borne in mind, moreover, that I am not concerned now with the question whether the notice was sufficiently definite and clear to induce likely bidders to come and bid at the sale. That is an independent question, which, the Privy Council have recently held, depends upon the facts of each case. As I have pointed out earlier in this judgment, I am not concerned in the present case with any imperfection of description, for a suit upon that ground is barred by section 33. I am concerned only with the question what was in fact described, however imperfectly. I am of opinion that the dominant description was the word ijmal coupled with the proportion of the revenue shown to be payable for the ijmal share. This purports to state the share in the tauzi number and, therefore, must be taken to be the dominant description in preference to a mere list of shares in villages which does not purport to state the share in the tauzi number. If the description was irregular it was nonetheless dominant. The origin of this list of villages is the requirement of section 13 that notice of the intention to exclude the separate accounts must be given. The accidental omission of two shares in villages does not deter me from holding that the entire ijmal share was notified for sale.

The interpretation which I have put upon the notification is confirmed by the next step in these proceedings. The next paper in this case is a declaration by the Collector to the effect that no bid having been made for the share exposed to sale, the share being referred to by the simple word "ijmal" nothing more or less—he (the Collector) would put up for sale the entire estate unless the other co-sharers, or one or more of them, were willing to purchase the share in arrear by paying within 10 days the whole arrear due from such share. As I have pointed out more than once, it is not possible to say that a mere list of shares in villages is a share in arrear. It can only be possible to speak of "a share in arrear" in respect of a share of the entire tauzi number for which a separate account has been opened or which constitutes a residuary share. There can be no doubt, therefore, that this paper confirms the interpretation which I have placed upon the notification under section 6; and as it is nothing more, nor less, than an offer of the ijmal share, it follows that the entire ijmal share was offered for sale to the co-sharers. Thereafter there was a report by the office to the effect that two of the co-sharers were willing to purchase the ijmal share. Of these two, the office recommended the offer made by Nathuni Narayan and his offer was accepted by a formal order made by the Collector on the 15th of June 1911. It appears to me that what was offered, sold and purchased was the entire ijmal share.

Incidentally these papers place beyond doubt the meaning of the word "ijmal" and can certainly be referred to for that purpose.

Thereafter, the Collector gave Nathuni Narayan a sale-certificate signed by him; and he caused possession to be delivered, and here we come to the first and only difficulty in the case. In the list of villages given in the sale-certificate some 13 shares of villages were omitted. But the sale-certificate is only one of the pieces or bits of evidence from which the Court is to infer what passed at the sale. In the presence of what appears to me to be conclusive evidence as to what passed at the sale, I am not disposed to attach much importance to the sale-certificate. Moreover, we find that possession was actually delivered of the entire ijmal share, and the sale certificate was amended by the Collector himself so as to include the plaintiff's shares. It is true that the amendment was made after the institution of the present suit, but that does not make any material difference. Some reference has been made to the difference between the amount of the arrears as shown in the sale notification and that shown in the sale certificate. It appears from the office report to the Collector that the amount entered in the sale notification was probably a mistake; or the office report may be a mistake. However that may be, the office reported that at the time of the notification for sale the arrear due was the amount which was paid by the purchaser and which was shown in the sale-certificate. The office report makes it quite clear at any rate that there was no alteration in the amount of the arrear such as to suggest an alteration in the property between the time of the notification for sale and the time when Nathuni Narayan purchased.

Upon the point of imperfection it is worthwhile to note that for the purpose of an offer to the co-sharers only, the word "ijmal" was obviously a sufficient description, for ex hypothesi they all knew exactly what the ijmal share was for they or their predecessors had all assented to the separation of the accounts.

I may repeat that the ijmal is a perfectly definite thing. It is the rights of the proprietors who have not opened separate accounts stated in the terms of a share in the tauzi number. A purchaser of the ijmal share purchases the right to take possession of the estate and to oust all interests not covered by separate accounts.

I have not referred to the cases upon the subject of imperfection of description. These cases all say that in order to set aside the sale it must be proved that the imperfection had an adverse effect on the bidding. The assumption, therefore, in every such case is that the description was in fact sufficient to convey the property and that in the absence of proof that bidding was affected, the sale must stand. The case principally relied upon in this connection is the case of Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Baignath Ram Goenka (1). In that case the revenue paying estate involved was itself a share, a 15 annas 6-dams share of a mahal named Bisthozari which included as many as 360 villages. The ijmal share in the estate was put up for sale, the specification being described, in the terms of the judgment of the Privy Council, as follows:— "Ijmali share which cannot be specified excluding the separate accounts." The separate accounts numbered as many as 148 and the sale notification stated that "the ijmali share could not be particularised owing to separate accounts having been opened." Their Lordships of the Privy Council decided that the specification was not sufficiently definite and clear to induce likely buyers to come and bid at the sale. They went on to find that in consequence of the irregularity in the sale notification the sale fetched only one-third of the value of the property. They accordingly set aside the sale. I would note in respect of this decision, first, that the facts of that case were very peculiar and it was decided on its peculiar facts alone. The second point to notice is that their Lordships expressly refrained from dissenting from any of the rulings which had been cited before them. They say merely that these rulings give no assistance and that each case must depend on its own particular facts. The third point to notice is that although it had been contended on behalf of the appellant that the defects in the notification were such as by themselves to entirely

KRISHNA DAYAL GIR V. ABDUL GAFFUR.

Uify the sale, yet their Lordships say that it is necessary to go into the further question whether substantial injury had been caused by the defects. They point out expressly that no sale shall be set aside unless the plaintiff proves that he has sustained substantial injury by reason of the defect. It is, therefore, clear that if their Lordships had been unable to hold that inadequacy of price had resulted from the insufficiency of the specification they would have held that the description was enough to convey the ijmal share to the purchaser. In the case before us the defects in the description are of nothing like the same significance. It is a case merely of minor omission due to carelessness. To calculate the details of the ijmal share in the Privy Council case might have involved some 50,000 items of figures.

Is it conceivable that if mistakes even to the extent of 4 per cent., as in the present case, had been made, their Lordships would have held that the question what passed at the sale would have been affected? I am of opinion that the case referred to affords no authority for holding that in the present instance the description was not such as to have conveyed the entire ijmal share to the purchasers if the notification under section 6 had resulted in a sale. Their Lordships had to do with the question whether the property had been sufficiently notified. What I have to determine is whether it was notified at all, a very different matter.

Bearing in mind that when the Act of 1859 was passed there were no complete lists of the villages in each tauzi number, the Act itself seems to have contemplated that a residuary share should be notified for sale under section 6 in the following manner:—

Firstly by stating simply: "Residuary share" (ijmal) and then by setting out under section 13 in detail every share, whether consisting of an undivided share or of a specific portion of the estate in respect of which a separate account had been issued, and stating that these were excluded from the sale. Supposing that in giving the list of excluded separate accounts under section 13 a mistake of detail was made, would that entirely vitiate the sale? I am of opinion that it would not and that it would merely be an irregularity for which a sale could be set aside by a suit brought within the limitations of section 33. As a result of the Land Registration Act, 1876, and of the recent rulings since 1905, the Collector when putting up an ijmali share to sale ought now to set out all the details of the interest of which the share consists. Can I say that the result of this is that if mistakes are made of detail, a notification under section 6 would be bad and the sale would be vitiated. I am of opinion that this cannot and ought not to be held. Where a bona fide attempt has been made to describe the ijmali share for sale for the purposes of the notification under section 6, I am of opinion that the sale should not be held to be void and that the mistakes should be treated as irregularities which may form the basis of a suit within the limitations of section 33 of the Act. The question of nullity or no nullity should, in my opinion, be determined by reference only to the meaning of sections 6 and 13 of the Act of 1859 in the years in which the Act were passed and not to the rulings under section 33, which did not arrive at their present stage till fifty years later.

The result is that I hold that the plaintiff's shares in these two villages, which admittedly formed part of the ijmal share, were conveyed at the sale which affected the entire ijmal share; and, therefore, the plaintiff has no title. I would accordingly dismiss this suit with costs in all Courts.

I understand that my learned colleagues will deliver judgments to the contrary effect.

The divergence of opinion can be stated in a few words: (a) In my view a sale cannot be held to be void merely on the ground that the notification under section 6 was not prepared in strict accordance with the rulings. If a sale could be held to be void on that ground section 33 of the Act would be rendered of no effect.

(b) The word "ijmal" has for many years been accepted in Bihar as the vernacular equivalent of the residuary share contemplated by the Revenue Sales Act. This use of the word was recognized by the Privy Council in the judgment I have cited. The plaintiff himself uses the word in that sense in the plaint and the meaning was not questioned in argument before us and has never been doubted. The word is never used for the residue of a separate account.

(c) Cases on Wills or private Conveyances are unsafe guides to the interpretation of an offer to sell under statutory powers. In the interpretation of a Civil Court sale the dominant consideration is the nature of the suit. In interpreting a statutory sale the dominant consideration will be the nature of the statutory proceedings. The policy of the law does not require the Courts to scrutinize the proceedings of a statutory sale with a view to defeat them. On the contrary every reasonable intendment will be made in their favour so as to secure, if possible, the object they were intended to accomplish. The notification should be construed as applying to the property which should have been notified unless to so construe the notification is to do violence to its terms.

The appeal will be determined in accordance with the opinion of my colleagues.

MOLLIICK, J.—The plaintiff alleges that he was proprietor of an eight-anna share in Mauzah Khaira Khurd and of an eight-anna share in Mauzah Sao Khurd, situated within Mahal Khaira bearing Touzi No. 4601, the sadr jama of the entire mahal being Rs. 5,281-12 0; that after the opening of several separate accounts in the said mahal, an ijmal share was formed comprising many mauzahs, in which were included the above two mauzahs belonging to the plaintiff; that the said ijmal share was advertised for sale for arrears of Government Revenue due up to the March kist of 1911, and that as a sufficient bid was not offered proceedings under section 14 of Act XI of 1859 were taken with the result that defendant No. 2, one of the recorded proprietors of the estate, purchased on the 15th of June 1911 for a consideration of Rs. 226-3-9 the shares of all the proprietors of the ijmal mahal save and except that of the plaintiff.

I have used the words 'ijmal', 'ijmal share' and 'ijmal mahal,' because they have been so used by the plaintiff in his plaint, but in my view the use of these expressions does not imply an admission that the residuary share in the estate was in fact sold.

The plaintiff accordingly sues for a declaration that the sale was illegal and contrary to law and that the auction-purchaser and his assignee No. 1 acquired no title to the eight-anna share of Mauzah Khaira Khurd and eight-anna share of Mauzah Sao Khurd and the plaintiff prays for recovery of possession and mesne profits.

The Subordinate Judge framed the following issues:—

(1) Is the suit maintainable in its present form?

(2) Is the suit barred under section 33 of the Revenue Sale Law, plaintiff not having appealed within the 60 days of the sale to the Commissioner?

(3) Had the plaintiff any right, title or interest in the disputed property at the time of the revenue sale?

(4) Is the plaintiff entitled to maintain the suit?

(5) Was the revenue sale brought about by the fraud of defendant No. 2?

(6) Is the revenue sale fit to be set aside?

(7) Is the suit bad for defect of parties?

(8) Can the sale in question and the kobala, dated 9th July 1911, executed by defendant No. 2 in favour of defendant No. 1 affect the plaintiff's share in the property in suit? What passed by the sale?

(9) Is the plaintiff entitled to recover possession of the properties in suit?

(10) Whether the plaintiff is entitled to mesne profits? If so, how much?

The Subordinate Judge found that the suit was barred by limitation and, therefore, liable to dismissal. He also found that the sale notification published under section 6, Act XI of 1859, which enumerates 38 mouzahs or shares of mouzahs was defective in omitting all mention of Mauzah Sao Khurd and in describing the share of the defaulters in Khaira Khurd to be two annas three pies instead of eight annas, but that this defect did not constitute a contravention of the law and that the description of the defaulting shares was insufficient. He accordingly dismissed the suit.

In appeal the learned District Judge considered only the point of limitation and dismissed the suit on the ground that as the plaintiff was required under section 33 of Act XI of 1859 to appeal to the Commissioner before the sale could be set aside and as under section 2, Act VII B. C. of 1868, the time for appeal expired on the 60th day after the sale and as the plaintiff's appeal was in fact lodged before the Commissioner long afterwards, namely, on the 22nd of December 1911, the appeal was clearly out of time. The learned District Judge appears to be of opinion that the appeal was, therefore, not a proper appeal and that the present suit, which was brought on the 23rd May 1912, is under section 33 of Act XI of 1859 not maintainable.

The plaintiff now prefers this second appeal on the ground that the learned District Judge is wrong in holding that his suit is barred by limitation.

If the plaintiff's share in the two mouzahs in question did not pass by the sale, clearly the bar of limitation would not apply. The plaintiff was not called upon to appeal to the Commissioner to set aside a sale in respect of property which had not in fact been sold and the provisions of section 33, which require that there shall be a properly framed appeal preferred to the Commissioner before a suit for setting aside the sale and for recovery of possession can be entertained, obviously do not apply. If, therefore, the plaintiff can make good the position that his properties were not sold by the revenue sale of the 15th June 1911, the suit is within time.

In order to determine whether or not the plaintiff's contention is correct, it is necessary to refer, first of all, to the sale notification.

In column 1 of the notification is the tauzi number.

In column 2 is the name of the mahal and pergannah.

In column 3 is the sadr jama of the whole estate.

Column 4, the heading of which is 'whether the whole estate is to be sold,' is blank.

The heading of column 5 runs thus:—'If only a share is to be sold specification of such share is shown.' This column is filled in as follows:—The word 'ijmal' appears first. Then follows a list of shares in 38 villages enumerated by name.

Column 6, the heading of which requires the names of the proprietors of the property to be sold, shows the entry—Mahabir Lal and others.

The heading of column 7 is: 'If only a share is to be sold, the amount of the sadr jama of such share.' It shows the entry of Rs. 685-11-0.

Column 8 is blank, and column 9 the heading of which is: 'If only a share is to be sold, the arrears due for it,' shows the entry of Rs. 276-10-9.

At the bottom of the notification is an entry in the following words—'other shares except those above stated will be excluded.'

It is admitted that in the list of villages the Collector should have included an eight-anna share of Sao Khurd and an additional five-annas nine-pies share of Khaira Khurd.

The question is whether notwithstanding these omissions the whole share in default must be taken to have been advertised for sale.

It is now settled law that if the notification under section 6, Act XI of 1859, is not according to law, but nevertheless a sale is held, that sale is void and a nullity for want of jurisdiction. It is immaterial whether notices under sections 5 and 7 are issued or not, but the authorities are unanimous that the notice under section 6 must be prepared and issued in accordance with law. Defects in service can be cured by section 8 of Act VII B. C. of 1868, but if the contents of the notice are not such as the law demands then the matter strikes at the root of the Collector's jurisdiction and the sale is null and void. If, therefore, the omission to mention the plaintiff's entire share in Sao Khurd and part of his share in Khaira Khurd has resulted in the advertisement of a share less than the share in default, then the notice is contrary to the provisions of Act XI of 1859 inasmuch as the unit in arrear has been split up by the Collector and something less than that unit has been offered for sale. On behalf of the respondents on the other hand, it is urged that this omission is nothing but a mere defect in description and that in fact the whole share in arrear was properly advertised by the Collector.

The question, therefore, is in the first instance, how should we interpret the sale notification? On behalf of the respondent the learned Counsel urges that the dominant description is contained in the word 'ijmal' in column 5 and that the subsequent incorrect enumeration of the mouzahs is an erroneous description which will be rejected on the maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet cum de corpore constat (a false description will not hurt when it co-exists with the subject itself), and he relies upon West v. Lawday (6), in which Lord Westbury held that "Where some subject-matter is devised as [a whole under a denomination which is applicable to the entire land and then the words of description that include and denote the entire subject-matter are followed by words which are added on the principle of enumeration, but do not completely enumerate and exhaust all the particulars which are comprehended and included within the antecedent, universal, or generic denomination, thenthe entirety which has been expressly and definitely given shall not be prejudiced by an imperfect and inaccurate enumeration of the particulars of the specific gift."

In my opinion this maxim is not applicable to the present case. I think the particular notification which we have to construe falls within that class of documents which was the subject of Brocket, In re; Dawes v. Miller (7). In that case, Joyce, J., reviewed all the authorities including West v. Lawday (6), and made the following observations regarding the rule laid down by Lord Westbury:—

"Now, notwithstanding this, I think, I may say that there is certainly no rule that in a Will where there are two complete descriptions, the former shall prevail over the latter, and I cannot think that Lord Westbury meant to lay down positively that in a Will where you have once got a complete description of a subject-matter in general and collective terms, every or any subsequent enumeration of particulars must necessarily be rejected if it do not include each and every item of the particulars, which would be included in the first or general designation standing by itself."

In West v. Lawday (6), the words of the testator were as follows:—

"Being possessed of a lease for lives, renewable for ever, of certain lands in the country of Kerry, in Ireland, which said lands are denominated Ballydowney, Clyney, and Farranaspid, all situate in the parish of Adahoe, in the said country of Kerry.....I do, therefore, require that the aforesaid lands should, as soon as after my decease as possible, be sold."

It appeared that some lands called groyne were included in the lease and the question was whether those lands had passed by the devise or not. The Court held that the dominant description being contained in the words "being possessed of a lease for lives, renewable for ever," the omission of groyne was only a matter of imperfect enumeration of particulars. On the other hand in Brocket, In re; Dawes v. Miller (7), the disputed words were as follows:—

"I devise the real estate to which I under the codicil to the Will of my late father Stanes Brocket Brocket, Esq., became entitled upon the death of Sarah Chamberlayne, widow of my late uncle General Chamberlayne deceased, namely, the residence known as Orford House in the parish of Oakley in the said County of Essex and lands and hereditaments in the parishes of Oakley, Stanstead, Montfitchett and Henham in the same county, etc." The question was whether a property in London, named No. 1, Hare Court, which was subsequently found to be covered by the codicil to the Will of Stanes Brocket Brocket above referred to and to which the testatrix became entitled, passed under the devise together with the properties in the parish of Oakley in Essex. There was no evidence to show that the testatrix was at all aware that she had any title in this property. Joyce, J., held that the specification was analogous to the specification contained in a conveyance by schedule or plan and was not merely an imperfect enumeration of the properties intended to be devised. In other words the specification by name and locality free from all ambiguity constituted the leading description and that 1, Hare Court, did not pass by the specific devise.

Now what is the position here? The list of mouzahs as it stands in the sale notification is perfectly self-contained and clear. There is no latent ambiguity at all. Supposing the word 'ijmal' did not occur at the top, the notification would in clear and unequivocal terms constitute an attachment of the particular property enumerated in this list and the note that other shares except those stated above would be excluded would merely signify that there were some separate accounts, which were being excluded from sale. The sadar jama in column 7 and the arrear in column 9 would merely indicate that they referred to a share in the estate comprising the particular property set out in this list. Section 10, Act XI of 1859, permits a recorded sharer of a joint estate held in common tenancy to open a separate account with the Collector in respect of his joint undivided share. Section 11 permits a recorded sharer whose share consists of the entire area of a specific portion of a land of the estate to open a separate account in respect of that specific portion. In other words, it permits a recorded sharer who has obtained a distinct portion of the estate within a ring fence to open a separate account. Section 70 of the Land Registration Act (VII B. C. of 1876) goes further and permits a proprietor who is recorded as a proprietor of an undivided interest held in common tenancy in any specific portion of the land of the estate, but not extending over the whole estate, to open a separate account in respect of this undivided interest.

Taking the list of villages in the sale notification as it stands, it seems to me that it might perfectly well denote a share covered by an account under section 10 or 11, Act XI of 1859, or section 70, Act VII B. C. of 1876, and the entries in columns 7 and 9 as well as the note at the bottom of the notification would not be inconsistent with such a view. How then does the addition of the 'ijmal' at the top affect the matter? This word is not known either to Act XI of 1859, or Act VII B. C., of 1876, nor do I find any mention of the word in the rules published by the Board of Revenue in their Sale Manual of 1906 and their Land Registration Manual of 1909. The Manuals do speak of a residuary share, namely, the share that is left after excluding all separate accounts in the estate, and the direction is that as soon as a separate account is opened then pari passu a separate account for the residuary share is also to be opened by the Collector, in his Touzi Register. The word 'ijmal' means nothing more than joint. It is an adjective and not the name of any particular thing or part of the estate. It is a relative term and has not even the fixity attached to the word residuary.

It is certainly not a name like Whiteacre or Blackacre, nor is it an universal or general description. It may apply to the residue left after excluding all other accounts, but it also may apply, when a co-sharer opens a separate account under section 70, Act VII B. C. of 1876, in respect of his undivided interest in a specific portion held jointly with other proprietors, to the residue of that specific portion which would then be capable of description as the 'ijmal' property of the other co sharers.

Therefore, the word 'ijmal' of itself does not materially alter the description contained in the list of villages in column 5 and furnish sufficient material for holding that it describes any residuary share at all, let alone the residuary share which it was the duty of the Collector to sell.

Indeed in those cases in which the word has been sought to be translated as meaning 'residuary share in arrear,' the opinion of our Courts is that it does not bear any definite meaning. In the case of Annada Charan Mukhuti v. Kishori Mohon Rai (8) the Court observed as follows:—

"It is obvious that the term 'residue' is a relative term only, and that it means what is left after excluding from the whole certain specific shares and that unless those specific shares are stated, it is impossible for intending purchasers to know what is being advertised for sale and for what they are supposed to be bidding,...and we think that the meaning of section 6, Act XI of 1859, is clear that the share to be put up for sale must be so described that there can be no mistake about it. Merely advertising that the 'residue' of an estate is to be sold without giving further particulars and stating what that 'residue' is, cannot be considered to be a sufficient description of any share in that estate." In that case separate accounts had been opened under sections 10 and 11 of Act XI of 1859 and the residue advertised was the residue after excluding all the separate accounts. The Court held that the description was not a sufficient description of the share in arrear.

To the same effect is Hem Chandra Chowdhry v. Sarat Kamini Dasya (9). The estate in this case consisted of four mauzahs and separate accounts were opened under sections 10 and 11; firstly, in respect of eleven annas odd in two mauzahs; secondly, of nine annas odd in the 3rd mauzah; and thirdly, of eleven annas in the four mauzahs, the remaining share of the four mauzahs being left as the residue. In the sale notification the terms were as follows:—"According to Act XI of 1859, the joint share excepting the separate shares is to be sold. Save and except these, all other shares are exempted from sale." The Court held that the description was not according to law and observed as follows:—

"Looking at this notification of sale, we observe that it gave very little or no information to the public, and unless one were to go to the Collectorate and look into the records there, he could not possibly ascertain what was the precise property to be sold, and in what villages that property lay."

In Amirunessa Khatoon v. Secretary of State (10), the point decided was that it was not necessary when advertising an entire estate to give all the mauzahs comprising it, and in Ram Narain Koer v. Mahabir Pershad Singh (2) the share to be sold was a separate account and the sale notification set out the revenue due from it as well as the extent and nature of the other separate accounts of the estate and Wilson and Porter, JJ., held that it was necessary to name the mauzahs comprising the separate account and that the share to be sold was sufficiently described by referring to the other separate accounts of which the necessary particulars had been given. These two last mentioned cases do not in any way touch the first two, which require that whenever a residuary share is sold, the specification shall state the mauzahs or shares of mauzahs of which it comprises.

In Ismail Khan v. Abdul Aziz Khan (4), the share sold was the residue left after the opening of a separate account under section 10. The notification contained the number of the estate, the revenue of the entire estate, the revenue of the share to be sold, and the arrear in respect of which the sale was to be held. What fraction of the entire estate this residuary share represented was not stated in the notification. The majority of the Full Bench declined to decide whether Annada Charan Mukhuti v. Kishori Mohon Rai (8) and Hem Chandra Chowdhry v. Sarat Kamini Dasya (9) were correctly decided or whether it was sufficient to follow the description accepted in Ram Narain Kore v. Mahabir Pershad Singh (2), but held that whether in any particular case the specification of the share or shares is sufficient or not must depend on the facts of the case.

In Bhawani Koer v. Ajzal Hussain (11) the ijmal share contained 42 villages whereas only 38 villages were enumerated in the sale notification and some villages which ought not to have been included were alleged to have been included, while others which ought to have been included were said to have been excluded, and the Court observed as follows:—

"If it had been proved as a matter of fact that the villages which were excluded were in fact part of the ijmali share and if it were proved that in fact this list of villages was an inaccurate list of what constituted the ijmali share of the mahal, I should have hesitated in saying that the notification complied with the direction of the law which provides that it shall specify the estate or shares of estate to be sold. It appears.....that the intention of that section is to enable the persons who intend to bid to know what it is they are going to purchase. If as a matter of fact the list was inaccurate and misleading, we should find some difficulty in saying that it complied with the provisions of that section. But in this case, we think the matter is more or less of academic interest because it has not been proved as a matter of fact, or at least our attention has not been drawn to evidence that it was established, that these villages excluded did form part of the ijmal share of the mahal in question."

KRISHNA DAYAL GIR V. ABDUL GAFFUR.

Finally, I come to the decision of the Privy Council in Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Baijnath Ram Goenka (1). In this case the sale notification described the share to be sold as the ijmal share. In the 5th column it was stated that the ijmal share could not be specified. A list of 148 separate accounts was attached to the sale notification and it was stated in a note that as separate accounts had been opened village by village, the ijmal shares could not be particularised except by excluding the separate accounts, which were given on a separate piece of paper. It was held by the learned Subordinate Judge who tried the case in the first instance that the sale was a nullity, because the names of all the mouzahs had not been specified. The Collector gave the auction-purchaser possession of 44 villages out of which only 31 were found to be included within the ijmal share. The High Court of Calcutta were of opinion that the notification was sufficient and that if it was not necessary to enumerate the mouzahs in respect of an entire estate, there was no reason why it was necessary to do so in respect of the ijmal share. Reliance was placed before the High Court upon certain forms for opening separate accounts prescribed by the Board of Revenue, but the High Court held that these forms were not part of Act XI of 1859 and that they merely contained directions which the Collector was required to follow as nearly as possible. The High Court finally held that the sale was not a nullity.

It appears from the argument before their Lordships of the Privy Council that the following cases were placed before them:—Hem Chandra Choudhry v. Sarat Kamini Daspa (9), Ismail Khan v. Abdul Aziz Khan (4), Amirunessa Khatoon v. Secretary of State (10) and Dilchand Mahto v. Baijnath Singh (3). Their Lordships, while accepting the proposition that the sufficiency of the notice must depend on the circumstances of each case, made the following observations:—

“As already observed, each case must depend on its own particular facts. What has to be considered is whether or not having regard to all the circumstances the specifications were sufficiently distinct and clear to invite likely buyers to appear and bid at the sale.

It is not enough that they may go and obtain the requisite information from the Collector's Office.”

“In their Lordships opinion the particulars in the notice should be sufficient in themselves to tell purchasers what they are invited to bid for. Their Lordships, therefore, have no hesitation in agreeing with the Trial Judge that the notification in this connection was insufficient and irregular and not in compliance with the requirements of the law.”

In my opinion we are completely bound by this authority and as the law now stands, whenever a residuary share is advertised for sale, the mouzahs comprising that share must be correctly described by the Collector. Their Lordships declined to accept the argument that it was sufficient to describe the residue by giving a specification of the separate accounts.

If, therefore, the term ‘residuary estate’ with the assistance of the information in columns 5 to 9 of the notification and specification of the separate accounts opened in the estate does not in the eye of the law convey to intending purchasers what they are bidding for, still less does the term ‘ijmal’ convey the necessary information. As I have already observed, the term only means joint and in the sale notification under consideration it wholly fails to denote any particular property or share of any particular property. As the notification stands, I am unable to say whether it means the entire residuary estate after excluding the separate accounts or the residue left after opening an account under section 70 (VII, B. C. of 1876). The word ‘ijmal’ in my opinion, is not a complete and distinct description of a subject which would constitute a leading description as in West v. Lawday (6) to the exclusion of the particulars contained in the list of villages. From this point of view the present case is a stronger one than Brocket, In re; Dawes v. Miller (7), in which there were two descriptions each sufficient to describe a different subject-matter. Here the subject-matter described by the term ‘ijmal’ is uncertain, while the subject-matter described by the list of villages is definite and certain. I have no hesitation in saying that the description given in the list of villages must prevail.

Even if it is held that the term 'ijmal' is a sufficient description of the entire residuary estate in arrear, I am of opinion that the list of villages must be regarded as an exception or limitation and not a confirmation of the general description. If further authority were needed I would refer to Tribhovandas Jekisandas v. Krishna-ram Kuberram (12). In that case a mortgage-deed transferred all the properties appertaining to 'an entire bhag,' but it was held that the particulars which omitted some of the properties comprised therein, constituted the leading description.

Again in Dwarka Nath v. Alope Chunder Seal (13), it was held that the declaratory portion of a sale proclamation could not by itself override the description of the property in the body of the notification, although it was argued in that case that as the Court had power to sell only the tenure itself there arose an irresistible presumption in favour of the tenure being sold.

The respondent, however, seeks to supplement the sale notification by the other evidence in the case, and the law upon this point is summarised by Taylor in his work on Evidence as follows:—(section 1226)

(1) "Where in a written instrument the description of the person or thing intended is applicable with legal certainty to each of several subjects, extrinsic evidence, including proof of declaration of intention, is admissible to establish which of such subjects was intended by the author."

(2) "If the description of the person or thing be particularly applicable and particularly inapplicable to each of several subjects, though extrinsic evidence of the surrounding circumstances may be received for the purpose of ascertaining to which of such subjects the language applies, yet evidence of the author's declaration of intention will be inadmissible."

(3) "If the description be partly correct and partly incorrect, and the correct part be sufficient of itself to enable the Court to identify the subject intended, while the correct part is inapplicable to any subject, parol evidence will be admissible to the same extent as in the last case and the instrument will be rendered operative by rejecting the erroneous statements."

(4) "If the description be wholly inapplicable to the subject intended or said to be intended by it, evidence cannot be received to prove whom or what the author really intended to describe."

(5) "If the language of a written instrument, when interpreted according to its primary meaning, be insensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, collateral facts may be restored to, in order to show that in some secondary sense of the words, and in which the author meant to use them, the instrument may have a full effect."

Rule 2 corresponds with section 97 of the Indian Evidence Act while the other rules correspond to sections 94, 95 and 96, with the exception that the Indian Law admits the author's declaration of intention in all cases. Although the case before us is a second appeal, the construction of sale notification is a mixed question of law and fact and we are entitled to look at the evidence on which the respondents rely.

Now in support of the contention that the sale notification advertised and attached the whole residuary share the respondents call in aid, firstly, the circumstance that the Collector could not under the law have sold a part of that share and, secondly, his order of the 5th June 1915, declaring under section 14 of Act XI of 1859 that as there was not a sufficient bid for the share advertised to cover the arrear, any of the other recorded sharer or sharers were at liberty within ten days to purchase the share in arrear by paying the whole arrear due from such share. It is true that we are entitled to look at all the circumstances existing at the time of the publication of the notification in order to ascertain what the Court intended to sell and what the purchasers thought was advertised for sale. But it is clearly not sufficient to say that because the Collector was empowered only to sell the unit comprising the residuary share and that because the presumption of everything being correctly done applies to this case, therefore, we must assume that what he did actually advertise and what the public thought that they were buying was the residuary share. In my opinion, the Collector had, under sections 13 and 14 of Act XI of 1859, jurisdiction to sell only that which he had advertised by the notification under sections 6 and 13 and the expression 'share in arrear' in his order of the 5th June 1915 must be read as meaning that which he had advertised in the notification under section 6 and no more.

Mr. Pugh endeavoured to argue that even if the Collector advertised something less than the unit in arrear, he corrected his error by making a fresh proclamation on the 5th June. In my opinion that argument will not avail. The Collector had no jurisdiction to amend anything in the original notification under section 6.

Nor is the position of the respondents improved by the Collector's subsequent proceeding. He gave the auction-purchaser a certificate, first of 25 villages on the 28th August 1911, altogether omitting therefrom Saho Khurd and Khaira Khurd, and on the 10th April 1913, that is, about a year after the present suit had been instituted he made an addition of 8 more mauzahs at the instance of the purchasers, correctly describing in his amended certificate the names of the plaintiff's mauzahs and his interest therein. The word 'ijmal' does occur in the sale-certificate, but as I have already observed it conveys no distinct and specific meaning; it is important, however, to note that even this amended certificate does not contain a complete list of villages.

Another circumstance to be noticed is that whereas Rs. 276-10-9 is shown in column 9 of the sale notice as the arrear due against the defaulting share, the arrear for which the share was sold on the 15th June 1911 is Rs. 226-3-9. Again while the sadar jama in the sale notification is Rs. 685-11-0 in column 8, the sadar jama in the sale-certificate is Rs. 519-10-0.

It may be admitted that the sale-certificate is not a certificate of title in the case of a purchaser under a sale under Act XI of 1859, and that the statements contained therein are not conclusive to show what was offered to and purchased by the auction-purchaser. And although in Lalla Bissessur Dyal v. Doolar Chand Sahoo (14) the Court refused to go into the facts lying behind a sale-certificate for the purpose of contradicting its terms and held that the sale certificate was the best evidence of what the auction-purchaser purchased, and although in Tantardhari Sing v. Sundar Lal Missir (15) and in Barhamdeo Singh v. Ram Narain Singh (16) it was explained that while you can look at the whole proceeding for the purpose of ascertaining what was offered for sale and purchased, you cannot give evidence for the purpose of contradicting the terms of your sale-certificate, I doubt whether the principles applicable to a sale under the Civil Procedure Code are also applicable to a revenue sale in which the sale-certificate is not the title-deed of the purchaser.

Therefore, taking the two sale certificates, the intention of the Collector and all his acts down to the 5th June 1915 as so many items of evidence for the construction of the notification, I am not satisfied that he did not attach something less than the unit in arrear, and that the bidders did not think that they were bidding only for the villages described in column 5. I think, therefore, that as he broke up the unit and advertised something less, the notification was contrary to law and without jurisdiction, and, therefore, the sale on the 15th June 1911 was also without jurisdiction.

The sale certainly did not pass the plaintiff's eight-annas share in mauzah Sao Khurd and his five-annas nine-pies share in Khaira Khurd that was omitted from the notification; but I go further and hold that as the whole sale was without jurisdiction, the plaintiff's two-annas three-pies share in Khaira Khurd also did not pass. If the other co-sharers of the residuary share in arrear had joined as plaintiffs, they would have been competent to recover their shares also but as they have not done so, we can only declare that the sale in respect of the plaintiff's property, namely, eight-annas share of Khaira Khurd and Sao Khurd is bad and that he is entitled to recover the same. The effect of this will be that the plaintiff will be a co-sharer with the purchaser defendant and that the plaintiff and he will be jointly liable for the revenue till a separate account is opened.

In the view that I take of the law the Collector is not required to specify the mauzahs when selling an entire estate or a separate account, but he is so required when selling the residuary share. As the word ijmal does not convey a sufficiently definite meaning, it might possibly be a salutary precaution to use the expression residuary estate, and to insert a note in column 5 stating that if the residuary share is found after the sale to contain property other than that enumerated in the list, that property also will pass by the sale. Such a note would not cure the irregularity resulting from an omission of mauzahs, but it would, I take it, have the effect of making Residuary Estate the dominant description and prevent the sale from becoming a nullity altogether. The sale in such a case would only be set aside upon the grounds prescribed in section 33 of the Act.

I have anxiously considered what the effect of this interpretation of the law will be upon the revenue administration. It is submitted by Mr. Pugh that the Collector will be seriously hampered in the collection of arrears and that it will be almost impossible in practice to bring about the sale of residuary shares. In the absence of evidence it is not possible for me to speak with any direct authority, but I have examined the provisions of the Revenue Sales Act (XI of 1859), Land Registration Act (VII B. C. of 1876) and the registers prepared by Government for administering those Acts, and I do not imagine there will be any serious difficulty.

Register A of revenue-paying estates requires that the mauzahs contained in the estate should be fully specified. Register C requires that a mauzawar register should be kept. Register D requires that an intermediate register affecting changes in the general and mauzawar registers should be kept. Section 30 of the Land Registration Act requires co-sharers to give information to the Collector of the establishment of any village and Registers 12 and 12A prepared under the Land Registration Act require that whenever a separate account is opened under sections 10 and 11 of Act XI of 1859 or section 70 of Act VII B. C. 1876, a specification of the mauzah comprising that separate account is to be furnished. There is also authority given to the Collector under the Land Registration Act to require recorded proprietors to furnish whatever information is necessary for the correct preparation of the registers. It is always possible, therefore, for the Collector to ascertain what villages or shares of villages are situated in the residuary share. The Collector incurs no responsibility in the matter and information is furnished at the risk of the recorded proprietors. If the Collector correctly describes the residuary share upon the information given by the proprietors, the notification under section 6 is fully protected. In my opinion, therefore, the Courts are not imposing an impossible task upon the Collector in requiring him to correctly state the mauzahs or shares in mauzahs that comprise a residuary share offered for sale.

As the plaintiff, however, contends that he is entitled to succeed even if the sale is not a nullity, I will examine also that position. If the residuary share passed and the share in the list of villages was a mere misdescription, then the error could only be impeached by an appeal to the Commissioner under section 25 of Act XI of 1859 and no suit would lie to set aside the sale, unless the ground of irregularity was taken before the Commissioner and substantial injury has resulted from the said irregularity.

In the present case the appeal to the Commissioner was made more than sixty days after the sale and was, therefore, barred. The appellant asks us to hold that under section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1908, the Commissioner was competent to admit the appeal for sufficient cause; that till he decides that the cause is not sufficient the appeal cannot cease to be an appeal and that having been brought within the statutory limit of time from the date of the rejection of the appeal by the Commissioner, the suit is within time. This argument must fail on two grounds

KRISHNA DAYAL GIRI v. ABDUL GAFUR.

The first is that a time-barred appeal is not an appeal till it is admitted for sufficient cause. Mir Waziruddin v. Lala Deoki Nandan (17) is authority for this proposition. The second ground is that section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act does not apply to Act XI of 1859. The matter depends on the construction to be put on section 29 of the Limitation Act (IX of 1908), which corresponds to section 6 of the Limitation Act of 1877. There has been much conflict upon the question whether the general provisions contained in sections 5 and 7 and other like sections of the Indian Limitation Act are applicable to local and special Acts, but, in my opinion, the correct rule was laid down in Veeramma v. Abbiah (18) and Panchkouri Ghosh v. Pran Gopal Mukerjee (19). The latter case is important, because it relates to the Act now under consideration and the test therein applied was whether the Act was self-contained. As to what is a self-contained Act, must depend upon the terms of the Act itself. No general rule can be laid down, but I take it that what is meant is that the enactment must either expressly or by implication suggest that the general provisions of the Indian Limitation Act are not to be applied for the purpose of extending the shorter periods of limitation prescribed by the Act. For instance, it would be impossible to hold that the Indian Limitation Act has any application to fiscal Acts, such as those dealing with customs and income-tax. In my opinion the Revenue Sales Act comes within the same category. Even since Regulation VII of 1799, when a remedy by sale of the estate in arrear was first substituted for the attachment of the person of the defaulter, the constant endeavour of the Legislature has been to perfect the machinery of law, so that the Government demand might be quickly realized and the title of auction-purchasers speedily quieted. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gobinda Lal Roy v. Ramjanam Misser (20) observed that sales for arrears of Government revenue were of constant occurrence and anything which impaired the security of the purchasers at those sales tended to lower the price of the estate put up for sale; that it was, therefore, of the utmost importance in the interest of the revenue paying population of India that all questions that could arise as to the validity of a sale for arrears of revenue should be determined speedily.

Looking at the scheme of the whole Act I have no doubt that it was never intended that the periods of limitation therein prescribed should be extended by the operation of section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act, and I am fortified in this view by Amirunessa Khatoon v. Secretary of State (10), where it was held that a revenue sale under the Act cannot be set aside on the ground of fraud. The appeal to the Commissioner, therefore, was not an appeal within the meaning of the law, and the present suit would be barred by limitation.

But as I have already held that the sale was not one under the provisions of the Revenue Sales Act, the suit is not affected by the provisions which require an appeal to the Commissioner. It comes under Article 142 of the Limitation Act and is within time.

The learned Counsel for the respondent has drawn our attention to the pleading in the suit and contends in the first place that the entire residuary share was sold. In my opinion claims in this country must not be too strictly construed and all that the plaintiff means here is that a share called the 'ijmali' share and alleged to be the entire residuary estate was advertised for sale. That this is so is clear from the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge. It is quite clear that at the trial the plaintiff raised the contention that the sale was a nullity by reason of the attachment of something less than the unit in arrear. Moreover the point being one of mixed law and fact and no additional evidence being required it is open to us to deal with it in second appeal.

The result, therefore, is that I would allow the appeal and decree the plaintiff's suit for recovery of possession. As the prayer for mesne profits has not been pressed I would not allow the plaintiff any mesne profits. The plaintiff is entitled to his costs in all Courts.

KRISHNA DAYAL GIR V. ABDUL GAFFUR.

ATKINSON, J.—It is unnecessary for me in this case to refer to the facts generally, having regard to the judgments which have been delivered by my learned colleagues. However, I desire to refer to the sale notification issued under section 6 of Act XI of 1859. Column 5 of that notification contains a specification of the share of the property which was offered for sale to satisfy the arrears of Government revenue. The share of the mahal offered for sale is described by the general term "ijmal"; and following this general denomination there is a description given of what the "ijmal" property comprises, namely, a list of shares in 38 villages. In the notification a statement appears that other shares except those stated above will be excluded. The plaintiff is the proprietor of an eight-annas share in Mauza Sao Khurd and also an eight annas proprietor in the village Khurd. Both these villages are situated in the mahal of Khaira in the District of Gaya. The shares in these two villages to which the plaintiff is entitled formed part of the "ijmal" property when the notification under section 6 was published; but in the description given in the specification no reference is made to the plaintiff's eight-annas share in Sao Khurd and only a two-annas three-pies share in Mauza Khurd was offered for sale. The sale notification further states that the sale of the property described in the notification was made to satisfy an arrear of Rs. 276-10-9 in respect of which the sadar jama is Rs. 685 11-0. The sale notified under section 6 of the Act of 1859 proved abortive; and the Collector subsequently sold the entire "ijmali" interest under section 14 on the 15th of June 1911 and the same was purchased by defendant No. 1, who subsequently transferred his interest in the property to defendant No. 2.

Mr. Manuk contends, first of all, that the notification published under section 6 of the Revenue Sales Act of 1859 was irregular; and that the plaintiff is entitled to have the sale set aside under section 33 of the Act, provided that the plaintiff can prove that there was substantial injury caused to him by reason of the irregularity complained of, the irregularity complained of being a misdescription of the property comprised in the "ijmali" share. For two reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed on this ground. In the first place the plaintiff did not appeal to the Commissioner within the period of sixty days from the date of the sale on the 15th of June 1911. An appeal was filed by the plaintiff on the 22nd of December 1911; but the same was summarily dismissed as being out of time on the 24th of January 1912. An appeal filed out of time is no appeal; and consequently the plaintiff's right to have the sale set aside on the ground of irregularity was barred by the special period of limitation provided by the Revenue Sales Act of 1859. Mr. Manuk admits the accuracy of this conclusion; but he argues that he is entitled to call to his aid the provisions of section 5 of the general Limitation Act of 1908. He argues that if he is able to satisfy the Commissioner that he had sufficient cause for not presenting his appeal within time, that then the Commissioner would under the general law of limitation be entitled to extend the period allowed for filing an appeal under the Act of 1859, so as to make the appeal presented by the plaintiff on the 22nd of December 1911 within time. This argument is erroneous; and, in my opinion, quite unsustainable. First of all if Mr. Manuk's argument be correct, no application was made to the Commissioner under section 5 to extend the time, even if section 5 of the Limitation Act can be considered to be applicable to the provisions of the special limitation contained in the Revenue Sales Act of 1859. The appeal was presented out of time, after it had become barred under the provisions of section 25 of that Act. However, in my opinion, it would not have been open to the Commissioner to entertain an application under section 5 of the Limitation Act so as to "affect or alter" the special provisions as to limitation prescribed by the Act of 1859 itself. Section 29 of the general Limitation Act excludes the applicability of the general Limitation Act to any special or local Act having a limitation of its own. There can be no doubt that the Revenue Sales Act of 1859 is a special Act which is applicable to the lower provinces of the Bengal Presidency, or to what is known as the permanently settled districts; and was primarily designed to facilitate the recovery and collection of revenue due to Government. Lord Macnaghten, I think, in the case reported as Gobind Lal Roy v. Ramjanam Misser (20) gives very cogent reasons why the general provisions of the Limitation Act should not be held to apply to the special provisions of the Act of 1859. The title of the purchasers acquired under a revenue sale should not be exposed to the risk and danger of being challenged and defeated by any uncertainty of procedure under the Revenue Sales Act. Mr. Justice Brett sitting alone in a case reported as Panchkouri Ghosh v. Pran Gopal Mukerjee (19) so held, on the ground that the Revenue Sales Act was a complete Code in itself, quite independent of the general law of limitation. That decision has never been impeached notwithstanding the fact that there has been a great conflict of authority in India on this point. However, I entirely agree with the reasons given by their Lordships in the case reported as Veeramma v. Abbiah (18) in which all the authorities are considered; and applying the principle laid down by their Lordships in that case, and that laid down by Brett, J. in the case to which I have referred, I hold that in the present case the general provisions of the Limitation Act have no application whatsoever to the Revenue Sales Act of 1859. Secondly in my opinion, on the first branch of Mr. Manuk's argument the plaintiff's case must fail because he has not proved that substantial injury has been caused to him by reason of the irregularity complained of. However, it is unnecessary to further consider this aspect of the case having regard to the view I hold on the question of limitation.

The second argument put forward by Mr. Manuk on behalf of the plaintiff is that the sale which was effected by the Collector on the 15th of June 1911 was a nullity; or in the alternative that the plaintiff's property to the extent of eight annas share in Mauza Sao Khurd and five annas odd in Mauza Khurd did not pass to the defendant No. 1 under the sale effected by the Collector. This is the real and vital question in this case; and it appears to me that this argument must be governed by the answer to the question as to what in fact, and in law, passed by the sale to the defendant on the 15th of June 1911? The answer to this question entirely depends upon the construction of the property described and offered for sale under the sale notification published under section 6. What, therefore, did the notification under section 6 offer for sale? It is contended that the term "ijmal" is a general denomination and description of a certain block or piece of land offered for sale and is quite capable of being ascertained definitely and with certainty, irrespective of the enumeration set out in the notification describing the property comprised within the "ijmal." In fact it is suggested that the ijmali share of a mahal is just as much a known factor as if one was to speak or refer to the known entity of the lands of Blackacre or Whiteacre. The law, I think, with regard to the description of property offered for sale, whether it is described in general terms or by means of a schedule, may be stated as follows:—Where the principal words of the description lack the certainty necessary for the rejection of the subordinate description as falsa demonstratio, and this subordinate description can be read as limiting the principal description, it should be treated accordingly. This was the law laid down by Lord Chelmsford in the case of Slingsby v. Grainger (21). And where the principal description is in form specific, yet if it lacks certainty it will be restricted by the general reference to the words of description: In re Seal, Seal v. Taylor (22). If the principal or general description of a property is followed by a schedule of the property comprised in that description, then only that which is comprised in the schedule will pass: Barton v. Dawes (23) and Cort v. Sagar (24). The dictum of Lord Westbury in West v. Lawday (6) is primarily applicable only to the construction of Wills. In Brocket, In re, Dawes v. Miller (7), Mr. Justice Joyce considered the principle enunciated by Lord Westbury and he says:—"Notwithstanding this, I think, I may say that there is certainly no rule that in a Will where there are two complete descriptions, the former shall prevail over the latter; and I cannot think that Lord Westbury meant to lay down positively that in a Will where you have once got a complete description of the subject-matter in general and collective terms every or any subsequent enumeration of particulars must necessarily be rejected, if it do not include each and every item of the particulars which would be included in the first or general description standing by itself." In West v. Lawday (6), notwithstanding the fact that the Will contained a devise of property in general terms, yet there was a specific enumeration and description given of the property comprised within the terms of the general devise. And on the facts of that particular case Lord Westbury held that the subsequent description did control and limit the prior general denomination of the lands devised by the Will. However, it appears to me, on the authorities, that each case must depend, more or less, upon the construction of the particular document in question in each case, whether it be a deed, a Will, or a notification of sale. "Ijmal" is a general or generic term. It may be intended to apply to the residuary interest of the joint owners of the estate after individual co-sharers have opened separate accounts in respect of their separate shares. The ijmali interest may be an entity or denomination of land or an interest in land which may vary from day to day. It is quite uncertain in itself; and the Land Registration Act clearly shows that the ijmali interest may and can be defined, if right principles are observed by the Collector, with certainty with regard to each share in each mauza respectively comprised within the ijmali interest or share. I hold that in this case the term "ijmal" as used in the notification for sale prescribed by section 6 of Act XI of 1859 is restricted by the general description of the ijmali shares which the Collector offered for sale; so as to show that only the described parts of the ijmali share were offered for sale. This view is strongly supported by the decision of the Privy Council in a case reported as Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Baijnath Ram Goenka (1). I feel myself unable to distinguish the principle of that decision from the facts of the present case; and I think that so long as the decision of the Privy Council remains unaltered I am conclusively bound to follow the law laid down by their Lordships' Board. In that case the "ijmali" share was offered for sale with the following description: "the ijmali share cannot be particularised owing to separate accounts having been opened. The share to be sold forms a separate estate after excluding the share in respect of which separate accounts have been opened." The learned Subordinate Judge who tried that case held that the description so given in the notification of the sale was an irregularity which rendered the whole sale a nullity and void as being without jurisdiction. The learned Subordinate Judge based his judgment upon the fact that the shares in each mauza comprised in the "ijmal" had not been set out specifically in the notification for sale. The learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court disagreed entirely with the view of the Subordinate Judge, and held that the description of the property sold as stated was sufficient in law to enable any intending bidder to know what he was bidding for. However, their Lordships of the Privy Council reversed the decision of the Calcutta High Court and restored the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge. In the course of their Lordships' judgment they say as follows: "In view of this divergence of opinion their Lordships have examined the evidence for themselves and they have come to the conclusion that the view of the Trial Judge both as regards the value and the fact that the lowness of price was due to the defectiveness of the notice was well founded." I take that decision to mean that the word "ijmal" is not an adequate or sufficient description per se of the property offered for sale under section 6 of the Revenue Sales Act of 1859 and the Collector in effecting such a sale must define with particularity the property comprised in the "ijmali" share offered for sale. If this view be right, and I believe it is, then it follows of necessity that if it is incumbent upon the Collector to describe the property comprised within the ijmali share, then he must do so with accuracy and with particularity. In the present case there was an obvious and a patent irregularity in the description of the ijmali property offered for sale—that is conceded—one entire share in a village was completely omitted and a five-annas odd share in another village was also omitted. There was thus not a complete enumeration of the several shares comprised within the ijmali interest of property offered for sale. If the construction that I put upon the notification be correct on the authorities which I have referred to, then there was a breaking up or dismemberment of the revenue unit which rendered the entire sale a nullity: because it is conceded that the Collector cannot sell part only of the revenue unit liable for arrears of revenue. He must sell the entire share and interest liable for the arrears, and he cannot break it up into parts. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have held that section 6 of Act XI of 1859 is protective of the interest of the proprietors of the properties to be sold; and the provisions of the Act must be strictly adhered to. Any departure from the terms and conditions of the Act renders any sale made under such conditions without jurisdiction; and such sale becomes a nullity in law. Acts similar to the Act of 1859 have always been strictly construed, because they involve the forfeiture of the interest of the proprietors of property merely for the non-payment of Government revenue. It is essential, therefore, that the governing authority, vested with statutory powers, should be coerced and obliged to act strictly within the statutory authority conferred on them by the Act. Therefore, I hold that when the Collector in the present case notified for sale only a part of the ijmali share in respect of which there was an arrear of revenue, he acted without jurisdiction and that consequently the sale was a nullity in point of law. The right of the subject is more sacred to me than the mere possibility of any inconvenience that may be caused to the Collector.

However, I think that on a further ground this sale is also void. In the case reported as Raja Thakur Barmha v. Jiban Ram (25), dealing with a sale under the Code of Civil Procedure, their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down that the property that passed by a sale in an execution proceeding under the Code of Civil Procedure was the property "attached" and nothing else. Applying the principle of that decision to the present case, the sale notification in the present case corresponds to the order of attachment in the case cited, and thus one is fortified in arriving at the conclusion that the sale was a nullity, applying the authority of the decision of Lord Moulton in the case referred to, where it is laid down that all that can be done is to effect a transfer of the property described in the order of attachment, which corresponds in this case to the notification. If the property offered for sale under the notification published under section 6 was of a clearly defined and limited character, the Collector could not, in my opinion, under the sale effected by him under section 14 of the Act of 1859, alter or vary or enlarge the property offered for sale, so as to make it inconsistent or at variance with the property notified for sale under section 6. He could only offer for sale the share of the property described in the sale notification; because the Collector's jurisdiction under section 14 follows as a natural sequence and consequence of the property offered for sale by the notification under section 6. Therefore, in my opinion, even though the Collector may in fact have, by the sale held by him on the 15th of June 1911, sold, and intended to sell, the entire ijmali interest in the mahal in question, nevertheless he exceeded his jurisdiction by offering for sale property or shares of property which were not offered for sale under section 6. And consequently the sale of the 15th of June 1911 under section 14 of the Act of 1859 must be held to be a nullity on the ground that it was inconsistent with the terms of the property notified for sale under section 6.

On both these grounds it appears to me that there has been an excess of jurisdiction, or absence of jurisdiction; and that consequently the sale is a nullity. Both these matters are quite independent of section 33; and the plaintiff is entitled to avail himself of the absence of jurisdiction in the Collector to effect the sale by challenging the entire proceeding. No doubt the pleadings are defective and cannot be said to raise the true issue for decision; but it is not denied that the plaintiff did urge before the Trial Judge that the sale was annulity by reason of the fact that his eight-annas share in Sao Khurd and five-annas odd share in Mauza Khurd had been omitted from the sale notification; and consequently did not pass at the sale effected by the Collector. Charged with the administration of the law founded on equity and good conscience, I consider that it would be unjust if we were to deprive the plaintiff, owing to any defect in the pleadings, from urging that the sale effected by the Collector was a nullity in point of law on the ground that there had been an excess of jurisdiction, particularly when that ground was urged before the Trial Judge and completely ignored by the lower Appellate Court. Accordingly I would hold that the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration he seeks and I would set aside the entire sale; and allow this appeal with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XX, r. 14—Pre-emption—Decree, conditional upon payment into Court, compliance with—Mortgage of subject-matter of decree by decree-holder.

Plaintiff obtained a decree for pre-emption conditional on payment into Court of the pre-emption money within a certain period. He raised the amount by a simple mortgage of the decreed property itself and paid it into Court:

Held, that it was a sufficient compliance with the terms of the decree.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Moradabad, dated the 17th August 1915, reversing that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Moradabad, dated the 8th May 1915.

Mr. G. W. Dillon, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. H. C. Hamilton and Dr. Surendro Nath Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption. The plaintiff obtained a decree for pre-emption conditional upon his paying into Court within thirty-one days a certain sum mentioned in the decree. The sum mentioned was paid into Court. It is alleged that it was not paid within time. How much foundation there is for this allegation we are not in a position to say. If there is no foundation for it, it is unfortunate that the point should be raised, as it will only lead to loss by the parties. The money, if it be found to be sufficient, is lying idle in Court. The real question which we are called upon to decide is, whether or not the deposit of the money, assuming it to be within time, was in compliance with the terms of the decree. Lakhpat Singh, not having the money himself to deposit, borrowed the money by executing a simple mortgage of the property, the subject-matter of the suit for pre-emption. The mortgage was taken in the name of a minor, the money being provided by the father, one Birbal. Birbal signed the original tender for the deposit of money. The tender named the parties to the pre-emption suit. It named the purpose for which the money had been paid into Court, and in addition to the signature of Birbal, it contained the signature of the Pleader for the decree-holder. The money was accepted by the Court without any objection on the ground that it had been paid in by a person not authorized to do so. It seems to us absolutely clear that the money must be deemed under the circumstances to be a payment made for and on behalf of the decree-holder, and we are clearly of opinion (assuming that the money was not sufficient and paid in within the time mentioned in the decree) that the terms of the decree were complied with, and the property vested from that time in the decree-holder. We allow the appeal, set aside the orders of both the Courts below and remand the case to the Court of first instance with directions to re-admit on its original number and to proceed to deal with the same according to law. The appellant will have his costs in this Court and in the Court below to be paid by the respondents.

Second appeal against the decree, dated 13th April 1914, of the District Court of North Arcot, in Appeal Suit No. 904 of 1913, preferred against that of the District Munsif, Arni, in Original Suit No. 835 of 1911.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar, for the Appellant.

This second appeal coming on for hearing on the 28th and 29th September and the 4th October 1916, and having stood over for consideration till the 10th October 1916, the Court (Spencer and Phillips, JJ.) delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—The main question for consideration is whether Exhibit A is admissible in evidence for any purpose. The lower Courts have construed it as a partition deed, and although in the document the past tense is employed, that is, "as we have effected a division" and "for our having thus divided", it is undoubtedly an instrument of partition whereby the parties divide their property. If the partition was effected by this deed and not prior to the deed, the deed must be registered under section 17 of the Registration Act and under section 49 of the Registration Act the document shall not affect any immovable property comprised therein, nor be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property. The lower Courts, while holding that the document is one that should be registered under section 17, have admitted it as evidence of the status of division. If, however, the division was not effected prior to execution of Exhibit A, by an unequivocal declaration, then we think that the document is altogether inadmissible in evidence, for the mere status of division in a Hindu family undoubtedly affects the family property, for on division the unascertained share of a divided member devolves in a different manner to the share of an undivided member. If, therefore, the deed be admitted as evidence of the status of division, it will at the same time be evidence of the transaction between the two brothers which brought about the division in status, as well as the partition by metes and bounds. This was the view taken by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Pothi Naicken v. Nagama Naicker (1) and although the other two Judges of the Bench express no opinion directly on this point, we are not inclined to take a different view. That view, however, applied to the circumstances of that case and in that case, there was no suggestion of any division in status other than that effected by the partition deed. In the present case, however, plaintiff alleges a division before Exhibit A. The lower Courts have both found that there was no such division before Exhibit A, but as we read the judgments, we think it is quite clear that they refer merely to a division by metes and bounds and have not considered the question of whether a status of division was not effected by the unequivocal declaration of one of the brothers. It has now been finally decided that an unequivocal declaration by one member of an undivided family

(1) 32 Ind. Cas. 486; 30 M. L. J. 62; 19 M. L. T. 50; 3 L. W. 115; (1916) 1 M. W. N. 79.

LAKHPAT PANDEY v. JANG BAHADUR PANDEY.

of his intention to be divided in status is sufficient to effect a partition, although division by metes and bounds may be deferred [vide Suraj Narain v. Iqbal Narain (2) and Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (3)]. This view of the case has not been considered by the lower Courts, and although the District Munsif has believed the evidence that Parsa Nainar sought for partition, which was agreed to by his brother Jaya Rao, that some properties were set apart for Parsa's marriage expenses and that the brothers messed separately, he has not considered the effect of this evidence as evidence of a division in status as distinct from a division by metes and bounds and has not determined the question of whether there was a prior division in status. The District Judge merely agrees with the District Munsif's finding. As evidence of an unilateral declaration of division in status Exhibit A would be admissible, if such declaration had taken place prior to the division by metes and bounds, for it would be that unilateral declaration and not the division by metes and bounds which affected the property and altered its nature and it could not be called a "transaction", for to a transaction there must necessarily be at least two parties. We do not, therefore, think that Exhibit A would be inadmissible in evidence under section 49 of the Registration Act in so far as it goes to evidence a prior unilateral declaration of division. In this view, we remand the case for a revised finding on issues 1 and 1 (a) in the light of the above remarks.

The finding should be submitted within six weeks, and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the District Judge of North Arcot submitted the following

3. It is argued for the defendants that an intention to be divided in status must be proved by cogent and clear evidence, and it must be admitted that both sides have played false to a considerable extent. I consider, however, that there is sufficient ground for holding that Parsa Nainar had declared his intention prior to the execution of Exhibit A, and that he was, therefore, divided in status. This is my finding upon the issues referred to me.

This second appeal coming on final hearing after the return of finding of the lower Appellate Court upon the issues referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—In the suit out of which this appeal arises the plaintiff alleged that he was entitled to one-third of the amount of certain bonds which stood in the name of the defendants or some of them. So far as this allegation is concerned it is correct, because the plaintiff had previously obtained a declaration to that effect from the Civil Court in a suit. He then alleged that the defendants had secretly realised the amounts of these bonds. The Court below has found that the defendants did recover on foot of the bonds. This being so, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover his share of the money realised or paid on foot of the bonds, provided he sued in time. The Court of first instance decided against the plaintiff upon the ground that he was bound to put forward his claim in the previous suit. The plaintiff appealed and the Court below has held that the view taken by the Court of first instance on this point was erroneous. In this we quite agree. The present appeal challenges the decree of the lower Appellate Court upon the ground that the suit was barred by limitation. We think that Article 62 of the Limitation Act is the Article applicable to a suit of this nature. The period of limitation prescribed is three years from the time when the money was received. In the present case the money was received more than three years before the institution of the suit. Therefore, the plaintiff's suit is barred unless he can call to his aid the provisions of section 18, which provides that if the knowledge of his right to institute the suit has been kept from him by the fraud of the defendant, then time shall run from the date when the fraud first became known. In this connection we may mention that the defendants even in the present suit denied that they had even then got the money. We have looked through the evidence and we find that the plaintiff did adduce evidence that he only obtained knowledge about two years before the institution of the suit. He expressly pleaded that the realisation of the money had been fraudulently concealed from him. The fraud of concealment seems to have been persevered in even up to the time the present suit was instituted. Under the circumstances we think that the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of section 18, and the reason why the plea of limitation was not urged in the lower Appellate Court was that the defendants knew that it was impossible to deny that knowledge of the realisation of the money had been fraudulently kept from the plaintiff. We dismiss the appeal with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

RAHAT ULLAH KHAN v. IBAD ULLAH KHAN.

Appeal against the order of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, Hardoi, dated the 14th November 1916.

Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellants.

Syed Zahur Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—By an agreement of the 25th March 1916 the parties to the present proceeding referred the matters in difference between them, which were specified in the agreement under ten heads, to the arbitration of three Pleaders of the Hardoi district, named Moulvi Nurul Hasan, Saiyid Amjad Ali and Babu Sheo Sahai. Some of the matters referred formed the subject-matter of three suits, then pending before the Munsif of Shahabad, and of two others pending before the Subordinate Judge of Hardoi. Instead of entering into separate agreements of reference in each case they entered into a private agreement for arbitration, which one of the parties filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Hardoi under paragraph 17, Schedule II, of the Code of Civil Procedure, praying that the necessary directions might be issued to the arbitrators to decide the matters in dispute according to the agreement. The opposite parties contended that one of the arbitrators, Moulvi Nurul Hasan, had refused to arbitrate, that paragraph 17, Schedule II, of the Code of Civil Procedure did not authorize a reference to arbitration of such disputes as were pending in the Courts except through the Courts in which those disputes were pending, and that in one of the suits, the subject-matter of which was included in the agreement, the parties had by mutual consent set aside the reference and were proceeding with the case on the merits. They further stated that they were no longer willing to have the matters in difference between them decided by arbitration, as the position of the parties was altered by the partition of certain houses under a decree passed by the Munsif of Shahabad. The learned Subordinate Judge directed the award to be filed, holding that if one of the arbitrators had refused to act another could be appointed in his place and that if a part of the property which was the subject-matter of reference had ceased to exist, the reference could validly be made about the remaining property.

Ordinarily a reference under paragraph 17, Schedule II, of the Code of Civil Procedure can only be made to the arbitrators appointed in accordance with the provisions of the agreement. But when an arbitrator dies or refuses to act, and the parties agree to substitute another arbitrator in his place, a reference can be made to the remaining arbitrators and the substituted arbitrator jointly. Such a substitution is considered to be a new reference and is as valid as if the reference had been made to him and the other arbitrators originally. Where after the filing of an agreement, any of the contingencies provided in paragraph 5, Schedule II, of the Code arises, paragraph 19 authorizes the Court to take necessary steps, so far as they may be consistent with the agreement, to make the reference complete. It is admitted by the parties that since the order of the Court below, directing the defendants to nominate another arbitrator in place of Moulvi Nurul Hasan, which is the subject-matter of this appeal, the defendants have duly nominated another arbitrator in his place, and a reference has been made to him and the remaining two arbitrators mentioned in the agreement jointly. In the circumstances the contention that the Court had no power to substitute another arbitrator in the place of the refusing arbitrator loses its force. In Wali Muhammad v. Bahawal Baksh (1), where an award sought to be filed was found defective, the parties were permitted to appoint other arbitrators to make a fresh reference.

It is urged, however, on behalf of the defendants that the reference should have been made through the various Courts in which some of the subject-matters of the reference were under litigation. The proceedings of those Courts are not before this Court, and it is difficult to say whether, simultaneously with the filing of this agreement in the Court below, steps were also taken in the Courts concerned to have formal reference made by them in regard to the matters comprised in the suits pending therein. In Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan (2) their

BRIJ NARAIN RAI v. RAM DHARI RAI.

Lordships of the Privy Council classified the different methods in which references to arbitration can be made, but that classification does not necessarily interdict the making of a private reference to arbitration in regard to matters, some of which may form the subject of pending suits. The subject-matter cannot, however, be adjudicated both by the Courts where the suits may be pending and by arbitrators at the same time, for as pointed out in Sheo Dat v. Sheo Shankar Singh (3), where a matter has been referred to arbitration and the agreement of reference has either been filed in or brought to the notice of the Court, the Court should not deal with such matter in the same suit save in the manner and to the extent provided in Schedule II of the Code of Civil Procedure. Where a reference has been made out of Court, it may either stay proceedings and require the parties to file the award, or ask them to file the agreement and make a reference itself. In effect a private reference of a matter covered by a pending suit is not thus interdicted, but an adjudication of the same matter pari passu by two different tribunals of co-ordinate jurisdiction cannot be permitted. In Tincourry Dey v. Fakir Chand Dey (4) and Venkatachellam Reddi v. Rungiah Reddi (5) it was accordingly held that it was open to the Court in which an agreement of reference to arbitration was sought to be enforced to refuse to file it, where the matter covered by the arbitration was one pending before another Court.

The agreement in the present case is not confined to the matters which were the subject-matter of decision in the other cases. In regard to the matters covered by the other suits, the parties can move, if they have not already done so, the Courts, in which those suits are pending, to make the reference unless those suits or any of them have been already decided.

The appeal is accordingly allowed, in so far that the order directing the reference to arbitration will be confined to the matters not covered by the suits pending on the date of the agreement, unless those suits have meanwhile been withdrawn or stayed pending this reference. No order is made as to the costs here.

Appeal allowed.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Munshi Gokul Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption. The sale was a sale of property comprised in two mahals. The mahals each consists of a number of villages. There also appears to have been a number of sub-divisions, called thoks. The plaintiff only sought to pre-empt the property comprised in one of the two mahals. Even in respect of this property he originally claimed that the vendor's title to a portion was bad. This, however, has been decided against him. The defendant-vendee pleaded that the plaintiff was entitled to pre-empt the property comprised in each of the mahals, and that not having done so, his suit must fail. It must be conceded that if the plaintiff was entitled to pre-empt all the property, the subject-matter of the sale, and he omitted a part, his suit must fail. A pre-emptor is not entitled to choose what part of the property sold, he will exercise his right of pre-emption in respect of. The plaintiff in support of his case and to prove the existence of the custom gave in evidence an extract from the wajib-ul-arz. This document records that the first right is with a co-sharer who was a near relation. The second right was to a near co-sharer in the thok. The third right was to the co-sharer of another thok "minbad hissadaran digar thok;" after that the property might be sold to a stranger. Admittedly the plaintiff is a co-sharer in the mahal in which that part of the property is situate which was included in the sale-deed but excluded from the claim for pre-emption. Prima facie, therefore, as a co-sharer in another thok in the same mahal, the plaintiff would have a right as against a stranger. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that if this part of the wajib-ul-arz is read as giving a right to co-sharers in a different thok in the same mahal, then the meaning of the preceding portion of the entry is obscure because it refers to a "near" co-sharer in the same thok. The plaintiff would, therefore, ask the Court to read the expression "hissadaran digar thok" as meaning the other co-sharers in the thok. We think there would be no justification in putting such a strained meaning on the clear words, particularly when we bear in mind that almost invariably where the entries in the wajib-ul-arz give the details of the right of pre-emption, all the different classes of co-sharers are exhausted before a sale can be made to a stranger. We must also in this connection remember that the entries in the wajib-ul-arz is the evidence which the plaintiff himself relies upon as proving the existence of the custom. There is no other evidence. We allow the appeal, set aside the order of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts.

Babu Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for the Appellants.

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—I deal first with the first point in the Officiating Commissioner's judgment. He held that the status of the present respondents was more than that of an ordinary tenant. What he meant by this is clear from his judgment and is that they were holding under a settlement decree. It seems to me that the decision of the Civil Courts referred to by him makes it res judicata that they were not so holding, and moreover the fact that decrees for arrears of rent have been obtained by the appellants against the respondents further supports this view. I consider then that they are not holding under the settlement decree the land in suit, though of course at some future time if they obtain the lease they would be so holding. The respondents wish to raise the point that they are under-proprietors, but this was not raised in the appeal to the Commissioner and cannot be raised now. As regards the claim to have rights of occupancy, the respondents can point to no evidence on the record to show that they satisfied all the conditions required by section 5.

There remains the second point in the Commissioner's judgment. The appellants argue that because they are the persons to whom the respondents as tenants are liable to pay rent that, therefore, they are entitled to issue a notice of ejectment. They are holding over after the expiration of the lease granted to them by the talukdar, the conditions of which they agreed to, and under the decision of Khuda Bakhsh v. Abid Husain (1), they are still bound by these conditions which they agreed to with their eyes open. One of the conditions of the lease was a very ordinary condition that they as thekadars were not authorised to issue notices of ejectment without the consent of the talukdar. The appellants argue that they are entitled to repudiate this condition, because it is not one expressly mentioned in the settlement decree which refers to the landlord's power to fix rent only, but when they agreed of their own accord to an ordinary condition of this sort I do not think that they are entitled to repudiate it, and it certainly seems to me to be in no way contrary to the terms of the settlement decree. There is nothing in the Act to prevent a zemindar and thekadar agreeing to certain restrictions in the power of the thekadar during the theka. It was certainly laid down in Lal v. Raja Uday Partap Udaya Dutt Singh (2) that any such restrictions should not obtain to the detriment of the tenant unless they were known to the tenants. But the present case is different. The question is whether a thekadar can repudiate in a suit with a tenant such restriction when the restriction is to the tenants' benefit.

I cannot accept the argument of the appellants that despite a definite restriction on his power to eject, every thekadar has against a tenant a power to issue a notice of ejectment. I consider then that as the talukdar has not agreed to the issue of the notice of ejectment in this case the thekadar was not entitled to issue it. For this reason I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The fact that a bargain becomes unconscionable if a particular meaning is attached to the words used in the instrument evidencing that bargain, affords no reason for holding that the intention of the parties to the bargain was otherwise if the terms are clear. But where a word used is capable of more than one interpretation, a Court is justified in adopting the interpretation which is consistent with the existence of a contract such as persons of ordinary intelligence would make and rejecting the interpretation which involves the acceptance of a contract such as no sensible person would be likely to agree to. [p. 44, col. 2.]

The word 'malguzari', although usually meaning an amount paid to the Crown, is susceptible of meaning the amount due from under-proprietors to the superior proprietor. [p. 44, cols. 1 & 2.]

By an usufructuary mortgage the mortgagee was to retain profits arising out of the mortgaged property after paying the land revenue assessed on it, in lieu of interest on the principal money. The mortgage was to be redeemed on receipt of the principal money only:

CHARU CHANDRA BISWAS v. LALLAN SINGH.

The Hon'ble Mirza Sami Ullah Beg and Mr. Haider Husain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The decision of this second civil appeal has been referred to a Bench as the subject-matter is over Rs. 10,000. The facts are as follows:—

Ajudhia Bakhsh Singh obtained an adjudication from the British Indian Association on 8th July 1869 against Babu Balbhaddar Singh and Bikramajit Singh awarding him under-proprietary rights in the village of Pachhamgaon and three other villages on the following terms:—He was to pay the land revenue plus 25 per cent. to the superior proprietor. In the next generation his successor was to pay an increase of one-fourth. In the third generation the payment was to be increased by one-fourth again. In the fourth generation it was to be increased by one-fourth again, and after four generations the under-proprietors were to obtain occupancy rights. Ajudhia Bakhsh Singh was allowed no rights of transfer. This adjudication was confirmed by the Financial Commissioner of Oudh by an order dated the 20th July 1869. Ajudhia Bakhsh Singh died, and was succeeded by Ranjit Singh. Ranjit Singh was succeeded by three sons Satrajit Singh, Lallan Singh and Narendra Bahadur Singh. On 26th July 1878 Satrajit Singh, Lallan Singh and Narendra Bahadur Singh executed a deed of usufructuary mortgage of the village of Pachhamgaon in favour of Manmatha Nath for Rs. 2,100. On 25th May 1914 Lallan Singh and the three sons of Narendra Bahadur Singh (Satrajit Singh having died without issue), plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 4, executed a lease for ten years in favour of plaintiffs Nos. 5 to 12 and authorised them to redeem the property. The suit for redemption was filed on 7th September 1914 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Partabgarh. Redemption was decreed on payment of Rs. 2,100. An appeal was filed against this decision to the District Judge. He dismissed the appeal. The mortgagees come here in second appeal.

The learned Counsel for the appellants has not argued the appeal on the first, second and sixth grounds. We have to decide the third, fourth and fifth grounds only. We are concerned solely with the interpretation of some of the conditions of the deed of 26th July 1878. The first condition postpones redemption for 36 years. In no circumstances were the mortgagors entitled to redeem during the first 36 years of the existence of the usufructuary mortgage. They were permitted to redeem under the terms of the deed during the next 14 years. The first condition continues that the mortgagee after paying certain charges (the nature of which will be considered later) is to retain the profits of the property mortgaged in lieu of interest at 12 per cent. per annum on the principal sum, that is to say, in lieu of Rs. 252 a year. When the period for redemption arose the mortgagors were to pay off the entire principal (mortgage-money). The condition concludes with the statement that at the time of redemption the mortgagors shall not have any claim over the mortgagee in respect of mesne profits of any sort and the mortgagee shall not claim anything by way of interest from the mortgagors.

The second condition is to the effect that, if the mortgagee should consider at any period that the transaction has become injurious to him, he may in lieu of the privileges afforded by the deed of usufructuary mortgage bring a suit for the recovery of his principal and interest at 12 per cent., after deducting the profits during his period of possession. This condition clearly means that if the profits amount to less than interest at 12 per cent. on the principal, that is to say Rs. 252 a year, the mortgagee has a right to take a remedy against the mortgagors for the recovery of the principal and the balance of interest. The third condition is to the effect that, whatever profits the mortgagee may make over and above Rs. 252, he shall be permitted to retain. So far the conditions of the mortgage present no difficulty. The mortgagee is entitled to profits amounting to Rs. 252 and anything more that he may be able to make. If the profits are less than Rs. 252 he can sue for his principal and the balance due to him by way of interest. The fourth condition, however, introduces a variation quite inconsistent with the previous arrangement. It states that, if the mortgagee has to pay anything on account of boundary disputes, et cetera, or in case the Government revenue is enhanced at a subsequent settlement, or if the mortgagee is put to expenses owing to the claim of third parties, the amount of the loss which he may sustain should be added to the principal amount payable at the time of redemption. The first condition states very clearly that the amount payable for redemption is Rs. 2,100. Here we find a subsequent condition stating that in certain circumstances the amount payable for redemption may be more than Rs. 2,100. The fifth condition refers to the management of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee. The sixth condition states that, if the mortgage be not redeemed between the 37th and 50th year by the payment of the mortgage money, i. e., the principal amount, the property shall be foreclosed.

We are not concerned with the validity of the transfer or the validity of all these conditions. We are concerned only with the contention of the learned Counsel for the appellants who has confined his argument to two points. He claims in the first instance that the plaintiffs shall pay, before they can redeem the mortgaged property, the amounts which were due to the superior proprietor over and above the actual land revenue and cesses paid to Government during the years that the mortgagee had been in possession, and that they must further pay before they can redeem the difference between the land revenue originally fixed and the land revenue as enhanced at a subsequent settlement during the same period.

The decision of the first point turns on the interpretation of the word "malguzari" in certain places in the deed. In other places the word clearly refers to Government land revenue. The learned Counsel for the appellants argues that in the places where the plaintiffs do not admit that it refers to land revenue, it also refers to land revenue. The learned Counsel for the respondents argues that in the places where he does not admit that it does refer to the land revenue the word means the amount which was due from the under-proprietors to the superior proprietor. Now it is to be noted that the under-proprietors do not pay land revenue direct to the Crown. They pay a sum equivalent to the land revenue plus an additional sum to the superior proprietor. The superior proprietor pays out of this sum what is due to the Crown on account of land revenue and retains the remainder for his own use. The word "malguzari" (although it usually means an amount paid to the Crown) is susceptible of the meaning which the learned Counsel for the respondents desires that we should place upon it, and we are of opinion that the view taken by the lower Courts upon this point, which is supported by the learned Counsel for the respondents, is correct. If the other view be taken the transaction would be unconscionable to a degree. The mortgagors would have been surrendering the profits of the village, should they amount to Rs. 252 or more, and in addition were agreeing to pay, according to the statement of the learned Counsel for the appellants, a sum of some Rs. 691 more out of their own pocket to the superior proprietor. If the profits of the village were less than Rs. 252 the mortgagors had to make up the amount. They were thus giving up all the profits and in addition were saddling themselves with a liability to pay Rs. 691 a year and were getting in exchange the use of Rs. 2,100. On our calculations they would, if this view were adopted, have been paying something like 45 per cent. or more for the use of the money if they kept those conditions, and were to continue to pay this amount for 36 years before they could redeem. The fact that the bargain is unconscionable would afford no reason for holding that it was not intended by the parties if the terms are clear. But, where a word is used capable of more than one interpretation, a Court is justified in adopting the interpretation which is consistent with the existence of a contract such as persons of ordinary intelligence would make and rejecting the interpretation which involves the acceptance of a contract such as no sensible person would be likely to agree to. We hold, therefore, that the word "malguzari" in the passages in question means the amount payable to the superior proprietor, and it follows as a necessary consequence that the mortgagee under the terms of the deed was liable to pay this amount.

The next point for decision is with regard to the enhanced Government revenue. We should have found ourselves confronted with a difficulty, had it been established that the increase in Government revenue had reduced the profits of the mortgaged property to less than Rs. 252, for, had such been the case, we should have had to decide whether to give effect to the first and sixth conditions of the deed, which explicitly state that redemption can take place for Rs. 2,100, or to the fourth condition which suggests that in certain circumstances redemption could only be obtained by the payment of a larger sum. The two positions are contradictory and it is impossible in our opinion to reconcile them. But we are relieved from the necessity of deciding what should be done in such an eventuality, for no eventuality has arisen which would justify us in increasing the amount, even if we were ready to accept the fourth condition as binding. We interpret the fourth condition to mean that, if owing to an enhancement of Government revenue the profits of the mortgaged property becomes less than Rs. 252, the mortgagors must make good the deficiency in profits at the time of redemption. The learned Counsel for the appellants does not, however, suggest that the profits have ever been less than Rs. 252. He recognises the fact that there is no evidence to show that there has been any deficiency, and frankly admits that, as far as he knows, the profits have always been more than Rs. 252. The contention for which he argues is that, even though the profits have not been less than Rs. 252 in any year, his clients are entitled to recover the difference between the old land revenue and the new. We do not interpret the condition as he would have us interpret it. We consider that this condition lays down that, if the profits be less than Rs. 252 through an enhancement of revenue or other causes, the mortgagors must make up the deficiency at the time of redemption and as the profits have never been less than Rs. 252 this clause can clearly have no effect.

These are the only points that have been argued. We dismiss this appeal. The appellants will pay their own costs and those of the respondents.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, for the Appellants.

Seyad Nabi Ullah, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The decision of this case turns upon the interpretation of a decree which was passed at the time of the first Regular Settlement in a suit brought by the predecessors-in-interest of the present plaintiffs-appellants. It appears from the documents on the record, Exhibits 1, 3 and 4, that at the time of the first Regular Settlement two persons Rai Rudra Prasad and Lachmi Narain brought a suit against the talukdar, claiming to have their right to certain manorial dues established with respect to a village called Rampur Bhawana. Exhibit 1 is a copy of the plaint which was filed in that suit and from this document it is made to appear that Rai Rudra Prasad and his co-plaintiff represented that they had been the old proprietors of this village. It was stated that some years prior to annexation the village had become included in the defendant's taluka, but it was at the same time asserted that notwithstanding this inclusion in the taluka these plaintiffs had been receiving various dues and also a cash nankar allowance from the talukdar. The suit was tried out and a decree was given in favour of these plaintiffs on a confession of judgment made by the agent of the talukdar who was examined on oath. A copy of his statement is Exhibit No. 3. Exhibit No. 4 is a copy of the decree which was passed. Among the items of dues specified in the plaint and also mentioned in the decree was one which is described by the name of dhara. It appears that this dhara consists of the right to receive half a seer out of every maund of grain produced in the village. Various other items were decreed, such for example as the right of fishery and the right to receive bundles of grass and to gather wild rice, etc. The decree was passed against the talukdar alone. The present suit has been brought by the plaintiffs appellants who represent 1/4ths of the interest which accrued to Rai Rudra Prasad and Lachhmi Narain under the settlement decree. The suit was framed as a suit for recovery of money, the sum demanded by the plaintiffs being Rs. 139-12-0. They alleged that they had not received their dhara dues from the defendant during the years 1318 to 1321 Faslis. It was stated in the plaint that up till the year 1309 Fasli this village of Rampur Bhawana had been a grain-rented village, that in the year in question the grain rent had been commuted into cash rent and it was for this reason that the appellants laid their suit as a suit for money, their case being that they were entitled to a certain percentage of the rent equivalent to the ratio between half a seer and one maund.

The Court of First Instance decreed the claim. The Lower Appellate Court has dismissed the claim, being of opinion that the talukdar was not liable to pay anything to these plaintiffs on account of dhara dues. The view taken by the learned District Judge appears to have been that although the plaintiffs' predecessors-in-interest acquired a right to these dues, they could only enforce that right against the tenants in the village and not against the talukdar. The learned Judge said that the talukdar was not the agent of these plaintiffs for the purpose of collecting these dues and accounting for them to the plaintiffs. He seems, therefore, to have thought that the only remedy for the plaintiffs in order to recover these dues was to proceed against the tenants. This view is clearly wrong, when it is remembered that the tenants were no parties to the settlement decree. That decree was obtained against the talukdar only and he is undoubtedly bound by its terms. The defendant-respondent contested the case on every imaginable ground and one of the pleas was that these dues had not been collected in the village for some time. The learned District Judge seems to have come to the conclusion that this part of the defendant's story was true; but at any rate it is clear from copies of the village papers which are on the record that the taking of these dues in this village is recognised, and it further appears that the tenants are liable to pay these dhara dues in addition to the regular rents they pay to the proprietor. The whole question is whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled under the terms of the settlement decree to enforce their demand against the talukdar in respect of these dues and whether the talukdar can avoid the liability by pleading or proving that he has not himself collected them. In my opinion the decision of the first Court is right and I think the talukdar is clearly liable under the terms of this decree to render these dues to the plaintiffs every year. If he chooses to collect the dues, well and good; if he does not choose to collect them he is still responsible to the plaintiffs for their payment. The situation seems to me to be perfectly clear. The decree of the Settlement Court is, of course, not drawn up in a very artistic form but the intention of the Court which passed the decree is easily ascertainable. There seems to be no doubt that the predecessors-in-interest of these plaintiffs were the ancient proprietors of this village. They managed to establish their proprietary rights at the time of the First Settlement; but inasmuch as the village had been included in the sanad granted to the talukdar it was not possible to restore them to proprietary possession. The decree which was passed in favour of these ex-proprietors and upon which the case of the present plaintiffs is based, was obviously intended to secure to these ex-proprietors some compensation for their exclusion from the settlement and I look upon the terms of the decree in the same light as if the decree declared a rent charge in favour of these plaintiffs against the talukdar. The learned District Judge lays stress upon certain words contained in the decree, indicating that the then plaintiffs were to be entitled to exercise their rights without any interference on the part of the talukdar. If we look at the nature of the various items which were claimed in that suit, it is obvious what the extent of the application of these words "bila muzahmat" is. They would properly apply for example to the exercise of the plaintiffs' right of fishery or of some cognate right; but the learned Judge was not I think entitled to fasten on these words and to deduce therefrom the conclusion that the plaintiffs themselves were given a right to go and collect these dhara dues from the tenants, subject only to the condition that the talukdar was not to interfere with them. As I have already mentioned, the decree could not bind any of the tenants in the village as they were no parties to the proceedings. I am satisfied, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover these dues from the defendant, whether the defendant chooses to collect them or not. As regards the amount which is payable it seems to be admitted now that the village has been cash-rented since the year 1309 Fasli. The plaintiffs represent, as I have said, $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of the interest which was acquired by Rai Rudra Prasad and Lachhmi Narain under the settlement decree and taking into account the figures relating to the gross annual profits as found by the learned District Judge, I find that the plaintiffs are entitled for the years in suit to Rs. 125-2-3.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed to this extent. The plaintiffs' claim is decreed accordingly and they will have proportionate costs in all three Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Execution—Amendment of decree—Person not judgment-debtor made judgment-debtor—Decree, whether can be executed against such person.

A suit for sale on a mortgage against G. and J. was decreed against G. alone. The mortgaged property proved insufficient to satisfy the decree and an application was made for a personal decree under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act as against G. alone and the decree was passed. On the attachment of certain property as the property of G., T. the widow of J. objected and got the property released. The decree-holder applied for the amendment of the decree to the effect that the name of T. might be added as judgment-debtor and got an ex parte order in his favour. He then applied for execution of the decree as against T. T. objected. The application was, however, dismissed as barred by time. On the decree-holder's appeal:

Held, that apart from the question of limitation the Court below would have been fully justified in refusing to put the decree into execution on the simple ground that the name of T. was fraudulently added to the decree without any decree having been passed against her. [p. 48, col. 2.]

Execution first appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Mainpuri, dated the 16th of August 1915.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Dr. Surendra Nath Sen, for the Appellants.

—The point involved in this appeal is that an Executing Court cannot go behind the decree. The respondent's name appears in the decree and she cannot now question the execution of the decree against her. Her name was added to the decree as the judgment-debtor on the 25th of March 1914. Notice was issued to her but returned unserved. Later on the notice was published in the Leader and on her failure to appear on the date fixed her name was entered as judgment-debtor. She cannot now come and object to the application for execution as she was made a party to the application for amendment.

Mr. Gokul Prasad, for the Respondent, was not called upon.

JUDGMENT.—The facts out of which this appeal has arisen are as follows:—In the year

SHANKAR KHAN DAT PURI v. SHEO SINGH.

1891 a suit for sale on a mortgage was brought against two persons, Gobind Singh and Jagmohan Singh, the minor son of Raghubir Singh. Of these two persons Jagmohan Singh pleaded that he was no longer a member of the family as he had been adopted into another family and had no interest in the mortgaged property. On the 18th of May 1892 the case was decided and an ex parte decree was granted against Gobind Singh who alone was held liable, and the suit as against Jagmohan Singh failed. In the decree it was set forth that if the mortgaged property was insufficient to satisfy the debt, the balance should be recoverable out of the other properties of the judgment-debtor who was the brother of Raghubir Singh. This decree was subsequently set aside, the suit was re-heard and on the 13th of June 1896 it was decreed as against Gobind Singh alone. On the 12th of June 1899 the decree was confirmed. On appeal on the 17th of July 1899 an order absolute was made, the mortgaged property was sold on the 22nd of March 1900 and the sale was confirmed on the 20th of July 1900. An application was made for a personal decree under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act as against Gobind Singh alone. Either on the 22nd or 30th of September a decree was passed as against Gobind Singh alone and in execution of that decree certain property was attached.

Musammatt Tilok Kunwar, the widow of Jagmohan Singh, raised objection to the attachment on the ground that the property was hers and was not liable to sale in execution of the decree. Her objection was allowed on the 4th of March 1911. No suit was brought by the decree-holder within the period of one year allowed by law and that order became final. On the 18th of September 1911 the decree-holder made an application, ostensibly for amendment of the decree which he had obtained in September 1900 against Gobind Singh. The application was to the effect that the name of Musammatt Tilok Kunwar, the widow of Jagmohan Singh alias Man Kunwar, might be added in the decree as judgment-debtor. Notice was apparently issued but not served personally on the lady. A notification was then put in a local newspaper, the Leader, and an ex parte order was passed on the 25th of June 1913 under which her name was added to the decree. On the 2nd of March 1914 an application for execution was made as against Tilok Kunwar. She objected. The lower Court disallowed the application on the ground that it was barred by time. The decree-holder appeals. There is no explanation of the order of the 25th June 1913, nor can it be understood on what ground it was made. There was a decree as against Gobind Singh alone and that application could in no way be treated as an application for amendment of the decree. It is quite clear that Musammatt Tilok Kunwar had no information of the application and the whole step appears to be a pure fraud. There is not in fact, and there has not at any time been, a decree against Tilok Kunwar which can be put into execution against her. In our judgment she was fully justified in coming into Court and objecting to the matter, she having been made a party to the application. Apart from the question of limitation the Court below would have been fully justified in refusing to put the decree into execution on the simple ground that the name of Musammatt Tilok Kunwar was fraudulently added to the decree without any decree having been passed against her. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Landlord and tenant—Occupancy tenant, whether can relinquish rights without relinquishing land.

SHANKAR KHAN DAT PURI v. SHEO SINGH.

An occupancy tenant cannot, without relinquishing the land, relinquish his rights as occupancy tenant in the land and still remain a tenant under some other tenure.

Appeal against the order of the Commissioner, Fyzabad, dated the 8th August 1916, reversing that of the Deputy Commissioner, Bara Banki, dated the 8th May 1916, upholding that of the Assistant Collector, Bara Banki, dated 5th January 1916.

JUDGMENT.

HOLMS, S. M. (November 20, 1916).—This is an interesting case in which I am unable to accept the view of the law taken by the Commissioner. The facts may be stated briefly:—

At settlement one Bhawani Puri got a decree that he was entitled to hold certain land at a rent of revenue plus 5 per cent. His successor and chela, Sheo Dat Puri, had some litigation with the lambardar and his title as an occupancy tenant was established. The respondents say that Sheo Dat Puri died in 1902. Apparently there was a dispute as to succession between two rival chelas, and one of these, Har Dat Puri, obtained an order for the entry of his name as occupancy tenant in succession to Sheo Dat. To this litigation it is admitted that the zemindar was not a party. It seems, however, that Har Dat Puri had been assisted by the zemindar in the contest and on the 13th November 1902 he entered into an agreement relating to certain property described as groves, offerings (charhara) and sankalp, the plots in dispute being included in the sankalp. In the agreement he said that he admits the zemindars had a right to possession of all this property and that at the death of his guru they had possession of it and had given it to him and that they had a right to take it from him at any time. Har Dat Puri died on the 29th January 1914, and two months later the present appellant applied for his name to be entered in the papers as his chela and successor to the occupancy rights. In the short interval of two months the zemindar had possession of the plots in suit other than the groves. As regards the groves, the result of the Commissioner's order apparently was that the groves should be recorded in the name of the present appellant as occupancy tenant, which is somewhat inconsistent with the rest of his order. The Commissioner's decision also mentions a house, but both sides admit that the house is not one of the plots in dispute. In the twelve years between the execution of the agreement and Har Dat Puri's death the zemindar took no steps to turn out Har Dat Puri and the zemindar took no steps to have the entry in the khetauni corrected whereby Har Dat Puri was recorded as occupancy tenant. I have questioned the respondent and he says that between Sheo Dat Puri's death and Har Dat Puri coming in he did not obtain possession of the land in dispute. So the statement in the agreement that the zemindar had obtained possession of the property does not seem based on fact. There was no relinquishment of the land under section 20 of the Oudh Rent Act, and one of the questions which arises is—Can an occupancy tenant without relinquishing the land relinquish his rights as occupancy tenant in the land and still remain as a tenant under some other tenure? I should be loath to accept this contention, for it would undoubtedly open the door to fraud. The nature of the tenure created by the agreement, were it to hold good, is by no means clear, and it is argued that even under it Har Dat Puri remained an occupancy tenant though he agreed that the zemindars could take the land from him at any time. If this is the effect of the agreement it is certainly waste paper once he died and could not affect the right of his successor. It might be urged that as section 4 does not apply to the case of an occupancy tenant, he is at full liberty to contract himself out of the Act. Even so I am by no means sure that the agreement had the effect of putting an end to Har Dat Puri's occupancy tenure, and the fact of the zemindar's long acquiescence in the record of his name as occupancy tenant seems to support this view.

I would set aside the order of the Commissioner and restore that of the Assistant Trust—Purchase of trust properties in Court sale—Purchaser, whether can assign for value—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 10—"Assign for valuable consideration"—Receiver, possession of, nature of—Adverse possession—Trespassers in succession—Title to properties, by whom acquired.

One S. acquired large properties in the salt trade. In 1894 by an instrument of deed of trust he endowed certain charities with some properties and directed that a sum of Rs. 144 should be spent every year on account of the charity and directed the members of his family to act as trustees. In 1895 he died and A., one of his sons, succeeded as trustee. In execution of a decree obtained against A. for debts due from his father the charity properties were attached and brought to sale. The first defendant became the purchaser and was in possession ever since 1898. In 1913, A. was removed from his trusteeship and B. was appointed in his place. In a suit by B. to recover possession of the properties on behalf of the charities:

Held, (1) that the suit was barred by limitation; [p. 55, col. 1.]

(2) that the power to apply Rs. 144 every year towards the charity properties was not a proprietary interest in the property alienated which could pass to an alienee but was only a power which the trustee had to exercise from time to time. [p. 52, col. 2.]

A purchaser in Court auction is an "assign for valuable consideration" within the meaning of section 10 of the Limitation Act, although he knows he is purchasing trust properties in which his alienor has only a limited interest. [p. 52, col. 2; p. 54, col. 1.]

The omission of the words 'good faith' from section 10 of the Limitation Acts of 1877 and 1908 is a clear indication that an "assign for valuable consideration" under that section need not have acted in "good faith"; it is enough if he pays valuable consideration. That intention is also clear from Article 134 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act. That Article does not apply to the case of a purchaser in Court auction. [p. 52, col. 2; p. 54, col. 1.]

So long as the legal title is transferred to the purchaser and possession given to him, whether such title is transferred by virtue of the legal estate vesting in the trustee or mortgagee or by virtue of a special power, the transferee can take advantage of Article 134. So far as alienation of trust property is concerned there is no distinction between a private trust and a charity. [p. 54, col. 1.]

The possession of a Receiver must be regarded as possession on behalf of the party entitled to the property as finally settled in the suit and where the suit is against a defendant who was in possession and is dismissed, the possession of the Receiver must be regarded as on behalf of the defendant and it does not suspend the operation of adverse possession. [p. 54, col. 2.]

Where there are successive independent trespassers who have been continuously in possession for the statutory period, the first trespasser gets the title and not the last who is in possession at the time when the title of the real owner is extinguished. [p. 55, col. 1.]

In section 10 of the Limitation Act assign for value" does not include a fraudulent transferee, one who knew he was purchasing only a limited interest.

The suit is based on promissory title. I had a promissory title for three years and I had been disturbed by the Receiver and I was a minor. It was a cause of action against a minor. Receivership is not alleged in the plaint. Possession of a Receiver is for the person rightly entitled. Sarala Sundar Dasi v. Sarada Prosad Sur (11).

[SRINIVASA AIYANGAR, J.—What we want you to say is that when your client knew it was trust property and purchased it in that belief, what is its effect?]

The argument on the other side is that nobody is a purchaser for value, if he is not a bona fide purchaser for value. Section 10 says that he must not be an assign for valuable consideration. Section 18 uses the words "other than in good faith and for valuable consideration". Section 14 says "prosecuting in good faith." Wherever the Legislature wants "good faith" it expressly says so. Act IX of 1871 uses the words "in good faith" in connection with a purchaser. Act IX of 1871 Article 134, the words are "in good faith." The omission is deliberate, having regard to the substantive law on the subject. See section 64 of Act

II of 1882; Prasanna Venkatachella v. Collector of Trichinopoly (12). The case of Radhanath Doss v. Gisborne & Co. (2) turned upon the construction of section 5 of Act XIV of 1859. Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Appellant, in reply.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore, dismissing the suit on the preliminary ground that it was barred by limitation.

The case has not been fully tried and except where the facts are admitted we have to take the statements in the plaint as true for the present purpose. The facts which raise the question in dispute may be shortly stated.

One Subbaiya Pandaram acquired large properties in a salt trade and settled certain of his properties in trust for charity by two instruments, dated 21st February 1890 and 13th December 1894 and marked as Exhibits B and B.1 in the case. He had an only son Arunachela, the 3rd defendant, and the plaintiff is his son. Subbaiya Pandaram constituted himself the 1st trustee and after his death his descendants according to seniority were to be trustees hereditarily. The trustee for the time being had the power, if he was so inclined, to take Rs. 144 a year for his own use out of the income of the charity properties and this power he had to exercise within three months after the close of the year. These are the only material terms of the trust-deeds for the present purpose. Subbaiya Pandaram died in 1895 and after his death a decree was obtained against Arunachela for a large sum said to be due from his father Subbaiya, and in execution of that decree the charity properties covered by both Exhibits B and B-1 were attached as the personal property of Subbaiya. The plaintiff objected to the attachment in the execution proceedings and on his objection being rejected instituted a regular suit to establish the right of the charity. While that suit was pending, the properties were sold in execution sale and purchased by the 1st defendant who obtained possession in March 1898, and he is in possession down to this date. Arunachela was removed from the trusteeship in July 1913 and the plaintiff is now the trustee under the deeds of endowment. The plaintiff now sues as trustee of the charity to recover possession of the charity properties, on the ground that their sale for the payment of the personal debts of Subbaiya was void and that the 1st defendant acquired no title by his purchase. He also charges the 1st defendant with knowledge that the properties which he purchased were charity properties. He says he was a minor till within three years before the action was brought. In these circumstances the 1st defendant having admittedly been in possession for over twelve years at the time when the action was brought and the charity represented by the then lawful trustee, the 3rd defendant who was under no disability, having been out of possession for over twelve years, the question is whether the suit of the plaintiff is not barred by the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff says no, and his case is put by his learned Pleader in four different ways.

First he contends that the trustee for the time being is entitled to a beneficial interest to the extent of Rs. 144 a year out of the charity properties which can legally pass to an alienee and that the execution sale did, therefore, pass an interest to the 1st defendant which came to an end only on the removal of the 3rd defendant from the trusteeship and that, therefore, on the principle of the decision of the Privy Council in Abhiram Goswami's case (1), as explained in Narasaya Udpa v. Venaktaramana Bhatta (5) and followed in Muthusamier v. Sree Sree Methanithi Swamiyar Avergal (16), he was entitled to bring his action within twelve years after he became trustee and that the possession of the 1st defendant did not become adverse to him or to the charity till the beneficial interest of the 3rd defendant, of which the 1st defendant was transferee, ceased. This contention is, we think, untenable. The Rs. 144 which the trustee at his option is entitled to take, is not an interest in the charity properties which can pass to an alienee and by virtue of which the alienee has a right to hold possession of the charity properties during the period when the alienor remains a trustee. It is really in the nature of a power which the trustee has to exercise from time to time and the trustee for the time being has no proprietary interest in the trust properties. This is the view which the plaintiff himself took, for in paragraph 4 of his plaint he says, "neither Subbaiya Pandaram nor his heirs have any proprietary right therein," that is, in the charity properties.

Next he contends that there was no limit of time for the institution of this suit and that section 10 of the Act applied. The argument, if we understood right, was that the 1st defendant was not an assign for valuable consideration, because though he is an assign and though he gave valuable consideration, he was not an 'assign for valuable consideration' within the meaning of the section as he had knowledge at the time of his purchase of the true nature of the property and that it could not be sold for the payment of the private debt of the trustee; in fact, unless he acted with good faith an assign for consideration is not an assign for consideration within the meaning of the section. There is no warrant for the introduction of additional words to qualify the plain meaning of the section and when we remember that the very words 'in good faith' which were found in the Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1859 were deliberately omitted in the Act of 1877, this introduction becomes still less permissible. The only authority cited is a case reported as Ram Churn Tewary v. Proctap Chandra Dutt Jha (3). That decision was adversely criticised in a case reported as Ram Kanai Ghosh v. Raja Sri Sri Sri Hari Narayan Singh Deo

SUBBAIYA PANDARAM v. MAHAMAD MUSTAPHA MARACAYAR.

Bahadur (17), where Mookerjee, J., examines the provisions of section 10 and the cognate Article 134. We entirely agree, if we may say so with respect, with that exposition. It is true that in a case reported as Singaram Chettiar v. Kalyanasundaram Pillai (8), the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Hannay said they were unable to follow this ruling of Mookerjee, J., as they thought that it appeared to be at variance with the decision of the Privy Council in Radhanath Doss v. Gisborne & Co. (2) decided under the Act of 1859 and other decisions which followed it even after the words 'in good faith' were omitted in the Acts of 1877 and 1908. This observation is merely obiter and a careful perusal of the judgment of Mookerjee, J., shows that it is in no way inconsistent with the decision of the Privy Council or the other decisions which followed it, as we shall shew presently. Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar relied on this and certain other decisions of this Court as to the meaning of the word 'purchaser' occurring in Article 134 of the Act as throwing light on the meaning of the words 'assign for value' in section 10; see Singaram Chettiar v. Kalyanasundaram Pillai (8), Tholasinga Mudali v. Nagalinga Chetty (9). In these cases the meaning of the words 'purchaser' as applied to a purchaser from a mortgagee was discussed. It is clear that an assignee merely of the mortgagee's interest is not a purchaser within the meaning of the Article. It obviously means a person who purported to obtain an absolute title which the mortgagee purported to convey. Except in an English mortgage or a mortgage by conditional sale, the absolute title or the legal estate is not vested in the mortgagee; and except in a very limited class of mortgages the mortgagee has no power to sell the mortgaged property. (See section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act.) If, therefore, the assignee from a mortgagee knows that his assignor is only a mortgagee and that he could under no conceivable circumstances dispose of the absolute title, as for instance, in the case of an ordinary usufructuary mortgage of properties outside the towns specified in section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act, that assignee may not be a purchaser within the meaning of the Article. That is the utmost extent to which the cases take us. Lord Cairns delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Radhanath Doss v. Gisborne & Co. (2) said that a purchaser must mean 'some person who purchases that which de facto is a mortgage upon a representation and in the full belief that it is not a mortgage but an absolute title'. It is to be observed that 'good faith' is not said to be an element in the definition of 'purchaser.' That was another requisite required by the Act of 1859 to entitle a purchaser to take advantage of the shorter period of limitation prescribed by section 5 of the Act; the 'full belief' need not be a bona fide belief. This is made quite clear at pages 17 and 19 of the report. At page 17 His Lordship says: "In pleading a purchase for valuable consideration in this country, the very first averment in the plea is, that the person selling either was seized, or alleged that he was seized, for an absolute title, and then the plea goes on to say that being so seized, or alleging that he was so seized, he contracted to sell, and did sell and convey that absolute title, asserting it to be such, to the purchaser, who paid his money for that which was thus sold," and at page 19 after considering the terms of the deed of transfer by the mortgagee to the purchaser, in that case, he says: "Their Lordships can find in this deed no evidence of a statement on the part of the vendor or of any belief on the part of the purchasers that the property of the Maheewan Estate was a property which the vendor claimed to hold by what we should call in this country a fee-simple title." It will be seen that their Lordships nowhere say that if a transferee from a trustee or mortgagee knew that his vendor was a trustee or mortgagee he cannot be a 'purchaser' within the meaning of section 5 of the Act of 1859 corresponding to Article 134. They merely use that fact as an element to be taken into consideration in determining the question whether in fact the transferee purported to purchase anything more than the mortgagee's interest. It must be remembered that a mortgagee as such has a transferable beneficial interest in the mortgaged property while a trustee as such has no such interest, though a trustee may also be a beneficiary under the trust. Both in the case of a trustee and mortgagee the purchaser may have knowledge that his vendor is only a trustee or mortgagee; but they may purport to transfer the absolute title in the exercise of a power of sale and the vendee may purchase it, knowing or having reason to believe that the trustee or the mortgagee was exercising that power mischievously or even fraudulently; at the same time he may bargain for and get a transfer of the absolute title. There can be no doubt that the purchaser in such a case obtains the sale in the full belief that what he is getting is a transfer of the absolute title, though at the same time he may know that if proceedings are taken against him he may not be able to retain his purchase; Article 134 in fact assumes that the purchaser in possession could not resist a suit for recovery and that his title by purchase is not good. If good faith were required, the purchaser except in a very small number of cases (as for example where the transfer is made in the exercise of a power bona fide assumed to exist by both parties though in fact there is no such power) would get a good title without the assistance of any law of limitation. So long as the legal title is transferred to the purchaser and possession given to him, whether such title is transferred by virtue of the legal estate vesting in the trustee or mortgagee or by virtue of a special power, the transferee can take advantage of Article 134. So far at any rate as alienation of trust property is concerned, there is no distinction between a private trust and a charity in this matter. The decision of the Privy Council in Damodar Das v. Lakhan Das (13) appears to be conclusive. There the two disciples of a deceased Mahant divided the properties of the mutt, which were trust properties to their knowledge, the junior chela obtaining a portion. It was held that the possession of the junior chela was adverse to the senior chela and the trust which he represented and the title of the charity was barred after twelve years of such possession. We must, therefore, disallow this contention.

The next contention is that the possession of the 1st defendant was not continuous for twelve years. It was said that in a previous suit between the parties (to which we shall have to refer hereafter on another point) the 1st defendant was appointed Receiver by the Court and that during the period when the 1st defendant was in possession as Receiver, his possession could not be said to have been adverse to the trust. In the first place there is no allegation in the plaint that the 1st defendant ever lost his possession after he got it in March 1898. Whether this so-called interruption was before the 1st defendant perfected his title by twelve years' possession or after, we do not know. As to the terms and conditions on which the 1st defendant was appointed, there is no statement. Mr. Ramachandrier says that his client will supply all these omissions at the trial, but the question is not one of proof, but of pleading. Assuming, however, that the 1st defendant was in possession as Receiver for some time during the pendency of the former suit, that suit having been admittedly dismissed, the 1st defendant now, who was also the defendant in that suit, could not be said to have lost his possession during his Receivership. It is not contended that the 1st defendant quitted possession or lost possession and that nobody was in possession during that period so as to revive the possession of the trust as in the case of Trustees and Agency Company v. Short (18). The possession of the Court through the Receiver can only be on behalf of the party entitled as finally settled in that suit and as the suit was dismissed, the possession must be deemed to have been on behalf of the 1st defendant himself, he being the successful party.

These are the points taken in respect of the claim of the plaintiff as the lawful trustee of the charity in succession to Arunachela, his father, who had been removed from the trusteeship in 1913. Article 134 of the Limitation Act has been held by this Court to be inapplicable to a purchaser in Court auction, Ahamed Kutti v. Raman Nambudri (19). We have held that section 10 does not apply. The only other Articles applicable are Article 142 or 144. Whichever Article applies, the 1st defendant having been in possession without any title whatsoever (for the case of the plaintiff is that the execution sale was absolutely void and conveyed no title whatever to the 1st defendant) the title of the trustee Arunachela and of the charity which he represented was extinguished [Damodar Das v. Lakhan Das (13)]. The plaintiff as a successor has no fresh cause of action. The plaintiff's suit then as the successor of Arunachela in the trusteeship fails and must be dismissed.

But the plaintiff contends—that is the fourth point argued by Mr. Ramachandrier—that he has put forward an alternative claim to the possession of the lands on the ground of his prior possession, even when Arunachela was the trustee, and that the 1st defendant in fact dispossessed him when he (the 1st defendant) obtained delivery in March 1898 and inasmuch as he, the plaintiff, was a minor at the time of the dispossession and within three years of the institution of the suit, his claim to recover possession, treating his prior possession as the root of his title, is not barred. This raises an interesting question as to the rights of successive independent trespassers who have been continuously in possession, if and when the title of the real owner is extinguished. The weight of authority is in favour of the view that in such a case the first trespasser gets the title and not the last who was in possession at the time when the title of the real owner became extinguished. It is now well settled that a person in possession without a title has the right to maintain his possession against all the world except the rightful owner; that he can sue in ejectment and recover possession—not merely in trespass—from any person who subsequently dispossesses him, unless the latter is the real owner or claims under him or justifies under his authority; proof by the defendant that the real title was outstanding in a third party would be no defence. In fact the prior possession is itself a root of title and the prior possessor has all the rights of a true owner except, of course, against the owner himself: see Asher v. Whitlock (20), where Doe v. Barnard (21) is explained; Perry v. Clissold (22), (20) (1866) 1 Q. B. 1; 35 L. J. Q. B. 17; 11 Jur. (N. S.) 925; 13 L. T. 254; 14 W. R. 26.

Sundar v. Parbati (23), Narayana Row v. Dharmachar (24). It is equally well settled that the effect of the extinction of the title of the real owner is not to transfer that title to the person in possession at the time of such extinction, though it is sometimes said that the adverse possessor for the requisite period obtains a title by statutory transfer. Section 28 of the Limitation Act like section 34 of 3 and 4 Will. IV, Ch. 27, merely extinguishes the title of the real owner, and the person in possession who had a right to retain that possession against all but the real owner in consequence of the extinction of the title of the real owner cannot be ousted thereafter even by the real owner and in that sense acquires a title by Statute; but it is not an involuntary transfer by Statute of the estate of the rightful owner, though the title acquired by the trespasser may have the same legal character as that lost by the rightful owner (See Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, Volume I, page 473) cf. Tichborne v. Weir (25) with In re Nisbet and Potts' Contract (26). From this it follows that if a prior possessor had a right to eject a subsequent trespasser so long as the title of the rightful owner was outstanding, that right could not cease to exist because that title becomes extinct by lapse of time. If then the prior possessor can eject the subsequent trespasser the title must be in the first trespasser unless, of course, the subsequent trespasser had obtained a title by adverse possession against the previous trespasser. This is the view taken by Sir F. Pollock (see page 9 of his Essay on Possession), by Dart (Vendors and Purchasers, page 474), by Mr. F. H. Carson (Real Property Statutes, page 80) and by Mr. Lightwood, (Possession of Land, page 275). The case of Asher v. Whitlock (20) appears to decide this very point as will be seen from the various dates given in the report. The title of the real owner appears to have become extinguished by the lapse of twenty years when the widow of the original possessor

(who had married again) and her second husband were in possession; at that time she had no title to remain or retain possession as her interest ceased by her second marriage and her daughter was the person entitled. The daughter's heirs succeeded in ejecting the second husband of the widow, which they could not have done if the title vested in the widow or her second husband, who were the subsequent trespassers in possession at the time when the title of the real owner was extinguished. The passage from Pollock on Possession was cited with approval by Lindley, L. J. (as he then was) in Dalton v. Fitzgerald (27). The only authority against this view are some observations of Lord Romilly in Dixon v. Gayfer (28), from which it appears His Lordship was of opinion that in law the person last in possession would acquire the legal title. The actual decision in the case does not touch the present question. These observations were dissented from in Asher v. Whitlock (20) where Cockburn, C. J., said, "The Master of the Rolls may be right in equity, but I doubt his being right in law." It appears that when the Limitation Bill of 1877 was drafted, it was proposed to add a section dealing with this matter but it was dropped (see Mitra, Volume I, page 445). On principle and on the authorities we think the plaintiff had a right to recover possession on his title based on his prior possession, and that right is not barred if the facts are as alleged by him. Mr. Rangachariar, however, contended that though this may be so in a case where the plaintiff claims the property beneficially, in this case as he sues to recover the property for the charity and inasmuch as the charity is barred by reason of the twelve years' adverse possession suffered by the lawful trustee, the plaintiff's suit is barred. We think this is not correct. For the purpose of limitation the plaintiff must be taken to be suing for a personal right, though no doubt if he recovers possession of the properties he may have to hold them for the charity. The charity is barred and can be barred only when its trustee or the manager is barred, as the charity can sue only through a natural person [see Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Hemanta Kumari Debi (29)]. Mr. Rangachariar did not contend that, as the 1st defendant obtained possession claiming under a sale in execution of a decree against the then trustee, (which sale must on the allegations in the plaint be taken to be a nullity) the 1st defendant could have resisted any suit for possession by the plaintiff by virtue of his prior possession.

This conclusion of ours would necessitate a remand of the suit for a trial of this claim. But Mr. Rangachariar contends that as this very claim based on prior possession was put forward as a ground of claim in a previous suit, Original Suit No. 16 of 1907, between the same parties, where also the present plaintiff asked for the same reliefs as he asks now and as that suit was dismissed, the present claim is barred by the former adjudication. Although this question was not dealt with by the lower Court, in order to avoid delay we decided to hear parties on this point in appeal and dispose of it here as the question is one of pure law. It depends entirely on the effect of the former judgment, Exhibit G. The plaint in the suit has also been read to us by the appellant and we find the material portions correctly set out in the judgment G. In paragraph 12 of the plaint in that suit the present plaintiff in setting out his various titles for the reliefs claimed there set up this very title of prior possession. The only relief asked for was possession of the properties sued for from the present defendants Nos. 1 and 2, who were also defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in that suit. The father Arunachela was made a party but no relief was asked against him and no relief by way of recovery of possession could possibly be asked as admittedly he was not in possession. The Subordinate Judge of Negapatam in whose Court that suit was filed, the same Court in which the present suit also was instituted, held that the prior possession of the plaintiff, even if true, gave him no cause of action to recover possession of the properties till that prior possession was perfected under the Statute of Limitation against the real owner, and disallowed the claim. Whether he was right or wrong in so holding, the decree dismissing the plaintiff's suit based inter alia on that claim is res judicata, and obviously prevents the plaintiff from again putting forward the same claim. The appellant agrees that this may be so, but as in this case, Arunachela who was the lawful trustee was a party to that suit, that decision cannot be res judicata; the argument is that as the plaintiff cannot recover against the lawful owner by virtue of prior possession and he having been a party to that suit, that decision was perfectly right and that that decision really held that the prior possession was not good as a root of title against a trespasser in the presence of the lawful owner. We are unable to accept this contention. It will be seen from the pleadings and the judgment in the previous suit, that though Arunachela was a party to that suit, he was only a nominal party; not even a declaration of title against him was asked—not that this would make any difference for the application of the principle of res judicata. The cause of action on the claim of prior possession was against the parties in possession and against them alone and it is against them that the suit was dismissed. We, therefore, think that this claim was not available to the plaintiff in the present suit.

Mr. Ramachandrier also contended that the respondent is not entitled to take this point now as he did not raise it in his written statement and if he had raised it then, the appellant might have avoided the plea by pleading fraud, negligence or other ground of avoidance of the previous judgment. There is no basis for this contention. For the defendants have pleaded this very judgment as res judicata in paragraph 17 of their written statement and an issue (issue No. 10) has been raised on this. The plaintiff never pleaded that the previous judgment was not binding on him. We must, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 153—Creditors and share-holders, meeting of—Arrangement—Acceptance by creditors not present at meeting, effect of—Majority.

In a meeting held under the provisions of section 153 of the Companies Act, the written acceptance of the arrangement by those share-holders and creditors who are not present, either in person or by proxy, cannot be taken into consideration to make up the majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the share-holders and creditors. [p. 58, col. 1.]

Application under section 153, Act VII of 1913 (Indian Companies Act), instituted on the 12th April 1916.

Mr. S. N. Sinha, for the Applicant.

Babus Ishwari Prasad, Girja Saran Lal and Lachhman Prasad Varma, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—An application was made by certain Directors of the Kashmiri Bank, Limited, a registered Company which had its registered office at Fyzabad, on 31st January 1916 to Mr. Lindsay, Judicial Commissioner, Oudh, under the provisions of section 153 (1) of the Indian Companies Act of 1913, requesting that the Court might order a meeting of creditors and share-holders of the Bank to consider an arrangement for private liquidation. The Judicial Commissioner passed an order on 2nd February 1916 directing that such a meeting should be held on 3rd April 1916. That meeting has since been held and this Court is now asked to sanction the arrangement at which that meeting arrived. Certain objections have been taken.

I find that there was unfortunately a fatal flaw in procedure which has vitiated the proceedings of that meeting. Section 153 (2) of the Indian Companies Act of 1913 lays down that before a Court can sanction such an arrangement, it must be approved by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors or class of creditors, or members, or class of members, as the case may be, present either in person or by proxy at the meeting. On looking at the facts I find that there were present six share-holders, five in person and one by proxy, who represented 320 shares out of 5,000 shares and there were further present eleven persons who stated that they held fixed deposits to the value, as far as I can ascertain, of Rs. 16,218-7-5 out of a total amount of fixed deposits to the value of Rs. 97,231-7-6. I cannot trace two of the persons so present as holding any fixed deposits at all. This may possibly be due to misdescription of their names, but in any circumstances it may be taken that at the outside the persons holding fixed deposits who were present at the meeting did not represent more than Rs. 20,000 out of the total sum of Rs. 97,231-7-6. There are further holders of Savings Bank deposits aggregating Rs. 2,950-14-6. None of these persons were present. There were thus in all eleven alleged holders of fixed deposits present in person. No holders of fixed deposits were present by proxy. It is clear that the majority representing three-fourths in value of creditors present either in person or by proxy was not obtained. The learned Counsel in support of the petition has urged that many other creditors who were not present in person or by proxy wrote to say that they were ready to accept the arrangement, and that if the amount of the holdings of these creditors be added to the amount of the holdings of those present, the requisite majority will be obtained. But unfortunately the provisions of the section do not provide for the inclusion of holdings where the holders have neither been present in person or by proxy and the acceptance of the arrangement by such persons is of no effect.

For the above reasons, I reject this application. It will, of course, be open to the Directors to come up again under section 153 (1) asking for permission to hold another meeting at which the same proposals can be put up, and then endeavour to ensure that the arrangement shall be accepted in such a manner as will enable the Court, if it considers desirable, to sanction the same.

The Bank will pay its own costs and those of the objectors.

Application rejected.

Accounts, suit for—Acknowledgment, suit on basis of, whether maintainable—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI rr. 23, 25—Remand—Preliminary point—Decision on some issues—Order, proper.

A suit for a sum of money due upon accounts, stated between the parties and for money lent, can lie on the basis of a mere acknowledgment. [p. 59, col. 2.]

Bhola Nath v. Net Ram, 3 A. J. L. 800, A. W. N. (1906) 185, followed.

Under Order XLI, rule 23, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, it is only when the Appellate Court reverses the order of the Court of First Instance on a preliminary point that the suit should be remanded [p. 59, col. 2.]

Therefore, where an Appellate Court decides some of the issues in a case and leaves the other issues to be decided by the Trial Court, the case should be remanded under Order XLI, rule 25, and not under Order XLI, rule 23. [p. 59, col. 2.]

First appeal from an order of the Additional District Judge, Meerut, dated the 12th September 1916.

FACTS.—The plaintiffs brought a suit on the basis of bahi khatas. They alleged that defendant No. 1 as head of a joint Hindu family carried on a money-lending business with him; that in a certain year defendants Nos. 1 and 2 having admitted and accepted Rs. 585 as due by them on account of a debt under a bond executed by defendant No. 2 struck a balance on the account book of the plaintiffs and having affixed a stamp label, put their thumb impression to it; that subsequently defendant No. 1 used to borrow money, as parcel debts; that on a subsequent date, defendant No. 1 after understanding the account and having found Rs. 1,611-8-0 as due by him affixed his thumb impression on the stamp label; that finally on the 1st of August 1914 defendant No. 1 having accepted Rs. 1,711-8-0 as due by him affixed a stamp label and put his thumb impression to the account book of the plaintiffs; and that after this date the defendant No. 1 borrowed Rs. 142-12-0 on different dates, and the sums were entered in the plaintiffs' account books. The plaintiffs, therefore, claimed Rs. 2,420-2-0. The defence was that the suit was not legally maintainable; that the finger impressions had been obtained fictitiously and without payment of consideration; that the claim was barred by limitation and that defendants Nos. 2 to 7 were not liable.

The Court of First Instance dismissed the suit on the ground that a mere acknowledgment could not form the basis of a suit. On appeal the lower Appellate Court held that the suit was maintainable. It further held that the thumb impressions had not been proved to have been obtained in the manner alleged by the defendants. The case was remanded under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code, for the decision of the third issue only.

The defendants appealed to the High Court.

Mr. Lakshmi Narayan, for the Appellant.—No suit can be maintained on the basis of a mere acknowledgment, unless such acknowledgment amounts to a new contract. The learned Judge is in error in assuming that the suit is based on the whole accounts. I rely on Ganga Prasad v. Ram Dayal (1). The facts of this case are very similar to the present case. The case of Bhola Nath v. Net Ram (2) is distinguishable. So far as the sum of Rs. 585 is concerned, it is clearly only an acknowledgment of the debt due from defendant No. 2.

Moreover, the order of remand is defective. The Court of First Instance decided the case on a preliminary point. The lower Appellate Court has remanded the case for the trial of one issue only. No doubt it decided the other issues incidentally, but the defendants have been greatly prejudiced thereby. The case ought to have been remanded for the trial of the issues left undecided by the first Court.

Dr. Surendra Nath Sen, for Mr. N. Upadhyaya, for the Respondents, was not called upon.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiffs claimed a sum of money as being due upon accounts stated between them and the defendants and for money lent. The Court of First Instance dismissed the suit apparently upon the sole ground that the suit could not be maintained on the entries in the bahi khata. It had framed three issues, namely (1) "Is the amount claimed due to the plaintiffs on accounts and did the plaintiffs obtain defendant Kallu's finger impression on account 1968-1971 Sambat by way of farzi and without payment of consideration? (2) Is the whole claim or any part of the same barred by time? (3). Are the defendants Nos. 2 to 7 entitled to be exempted or are they liable for the amount claimed?" Witnesses had been called by both parties and it is quite clear that the learned Additional District Judge on appeal was against the defendants on all the issues except the third. The main contention was as to whether or not the plaintiff's suit lay as alleged in the plaint. The Court of First Instance on the authority of Ganga Prasad v. Ram Dayal (1) had dismissed the claim. The lower Appellate Court overruled the objection and referred to the later case of Bhola Nath v. Net Ram (2). We think the lower Appellate Court was correct in the view it has taken of the law, and we also agree with the reasons and think that the later authority is the one which should be followed in the present case. The present appeal complains that the Court ought not to have remanded merely the third issue but ought, after deciding the preliminary point, to have remanded the entire case. There is some force in this contention. Under Order XLI, rule 23, it is only when the Appellate Court reverses the Court of First Instance on a preliminary point that the suit should be remanded. If the lower Appellate Court had decided itself, on the materials it had, all the issues except the third issue and if it was not prepared to decide this issue, what it should have done was to have referred the third issue to the Court of First Instance under Order XLI, rule 25, and not remanded the case under Order XLI, rule 23. We think that the Court did decide the first two issues and the only issue left undecided was the third issue. We accordingly allow the appeal to this extent, that we send back the case to the lower Appellate Court with directions that it must either decide the third issue itself (if there are materials on the record to enable it to do so), or refer an issue to the Court of First Instance, and on the return made to that issue finally dispose of the

(1) 23 A. 502; A. W. N. (1901) 150.

(2) 3 A. L. J. 800; A. W. N. (1906) 185.

JUDGMENT.

CAMPBELL, J. M.—(April 20, 1916).—I am unable to agree with the Commissioner's finding in this case. He has himself decided in Appeal No. 88, Lihazunnisa v. Syed Nadir Mirza, on November 25th, 1915 that the rent-free grant in favour of Akbari Begum (from whom the present respondents derive their title) was not proved to be fifty years old and that, therefore, her descendants should be assessed to rent as ordinary tenants under section 107 G, and not as under-proprietors under section 107H.

The present respondents are purchasers from Akbari Begum's descendants and because they are found to have acquired their position for valuable consideration, it is held that they have under-proprietary rights under section 107H while their vendors have only ordinary tenants' rights under section 107G. In other words the vendee has a better status than his vendor. This is the absurd situation arrived at by accepting the findings in Appeal No. 28 of 1912-13 [Ghulam Sarvar v. Muhammad Ambar Ali Khan (1)], as a sound exposition of the existing law. I have repeatedly disagreed with it myself, and think that my colleague holds similar views. I am of opinion that the purchaser of a rent-free grant cannot under any circumstances acquire a title superior to that of his vendor.

I would, therefore, set aside the orders of all the lower Courts and, finding that the present respondents have no title superior to that of ordinary tenants, would direct that the land held by them be assessed to rent under section 107G. The Assistant Collector and Deputy Commissioner both held that the respondents had entirely failed to establish any title to proprietary rights. This finding was not appealed against to the Commissioner, and the Deputy Commissioner's order is now final. It is now argued for respondents that because the Commissioner summarily dismissed plaintiffs-appellants' appeal, they were prevented from putting in a cross-objection raising this question of proprietary title and that, therefore, the case should be remanded to the Commissioner to enable it to be raised. I never heard such a preposterous argument and decline to entertain it. In any case I entirely agree with the Assistant Collector and Deputy Commissioner's views on the subject. I would give the appellant his costs in all Courts and Rs. 50 Pleader's fees.

HOLMS, S. M.—When my colleague's judgment came before me I fixed a date to hear Counsel of both sides, as my colleague wishes to dissent from a previous decision of the Board, though not a selected decision, namely that of Sir Duncan Baillie and Mr. Tweedy in Ghulam Sarvar v. Muhammad Ambar Ali Khan (1), dated 12th December 1913. Before going into that question I will deal first with a further contention of the respondent that he has a proprietary title in the land in suit. The Assistant Collector decided that he had no such title and the Deputy Commissioner upheld this order. The present respondent did not appeal to the Commissioner against the decisions of the lower Courts and ordinarily could not raise this point now. It is urged that had the Commissioner fixed a date for the hearing of parties in the appeal before him he could have raised this point by a cross-objection, but the Commissioner heard the appeal summarily without sending for parties. As he did not appeal to the Commissioner against the decision of the two lower Courts that he had no proprietary title, I agree with my colleague that the question cannot be raised now.
(1) 25 Ind. Cas. 594; 1 O. L. J. 325.

GIANI RAM v. MARI.

The interpretation of the words in question of section 107H is not an easy matter. The wording of section 158 of the Agra Tenancy Act in this respect is almost precisely the same as that of the section of the Oudh Act. Sir Duncan Baillie in his judgment writes that a similar question has frequently arisen under section 151 (b) of the Agra Act and has been decided. To begin with the wording of section 151 (b) of the Agra Act, is not precisely the same as that of section 158. Search has been made for the decisions to which Sir Duncan Baillie refers, either of the Board or of the High Court, but they cannot be found, and the Counsel in the present case are unable to trace them. Sir Duncan Baillie writes:—"I think it reasonable to consider that the law intended to protect all persons who in good faith paid good money for the acquisition of a right which they regarded as valuable and transferable, and which would have been valuable and transferable except for the operation of the special law as to rent-free tenures." I rather take the view of Mr. Tweedy who wrote:—"It may be doubted whether the Legislature intended the protection contemplated by the Senior Member, for the doctrine of caveat emptor applies and the purchaser is bound to make sure of the title before he makes the bargain."

Apart from these arguments the only reason for the decision of my predecessors was that the words "acquired for valuable consideration" are plain and to hold as my colleague now wishes to hold would be to read before these words the word "originally."

The appellant on the other hand urges that the words of the section should be so interpreted as not to violate the well-known rule of law that a vendee cannot have a better title than his vendor, and argues that, reading the whole clause together, which begins by referring to the acquisition in consideration of the loss of right previously vested in the grantee and goes on to refer to acquisition by a written instrument for a valuable consideration, the meaning obviously is that the second acquisition must also be by the grantee. For this point of view there is a good deal to be said. It has been argued that the word "acquire" necessarily implies that the vendor must have had a transferable interest which is capable of passing to a purchaser, and that a rent-free interest which can at once be put a stop to by action of the original grantor cannot be said to be such an interest. This argument does not seem to be altogether conclusive.

On the whole, however, I agree with the view taken by my colleague which is the view I took as Commissioner of Fyzabad when the decision in Ghulam Sarvar's case (1) was not known to me.

I concur in the proposed order.

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Hissar, dated the 31st July 1914.

Mr. Sundar Das, for the Appellants.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Chajju, a Jat of Mauza Kheri Gangan, Tahsil Hansi, District Hissar, who was the last male proprietor of the land in dispute, died leaving a widow Musammât Mari. It appears that she adopted one Hira, her husband's sister's son, and got the estate mutated in his favour on the 27th February 1908. The plaintiffs, who are Jats of another got and proprietors in the thula, claimed a declaration that the adoption and the mutation consequent thereupon should not affect their rights in the estate on the death of Musammât Mari.

The point for determination is whether the proprietors in the thula have any locus standi to contest the widow's power to adopt a son to her husband. Now it has been laid down in Allah Ditta v. Gauhra (1) that the onus is upon the proprietors of the patti to establish their right to contest an alienation by a widow and that a widow's estate is only limited for the benefit of reversioners, and where there are none, she is, to all intents and purposes, an absolute owner. Upon the present record there is not an iota of evidence to discharge this onus. It is true that in answer to question 71 the proprietors stated that "if a man dies intestate leaving no relations, his immoveable property devolves on all the land-owners of the thula or panna in which the land of the deceased is situate." It must, however, be remembered that in the present case the proprietors of the thula are not a compact body, but are of miscellaneous tribes, and I do not think that this provision of the riwaj-i-am was intended to apply to the case of a thula, in which the proprietors have no community of interest.

Further, I am not prepared to hold that, even in the absence of the adoption, the proprietors would be entitled to succeed to the land in preference to the deceased's sister's son. The entry in the riwaj-i-am excluding a sister or a sister's son from succession was not intended to be an absolute provision, and it was hardly contemplated that they should yield to the proprietary body of a heterogeneous character. No instance of the succession of the proprietors of a thula as against a sister or sister's son is forthcoming, and the riwaj-i-am does not, therefore, create a presumption in favour of the plaintiffs, vide. inter alia, Devi Singh v. Premi (2). In fact, in at least two judgments of this Court Bishen Singh v. Bhagwan Singh (3) (Jats of Ambala District) and Ballu v. Gur Dyal (4) (Girths of Kangra District) it has been held that a sister's son excludes the village proprietary body.

Upon both the grounds set out above the plaintiffs' claim must be dismissed. I accordingly confirm the decree of the lower Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The decision by the Settlement Court holding a tenant to have heritable and non-transferable rights is a judicial decision as contemplated by section 79 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act; and the rent of a tenant holding under such a decision cannot be enhanced under section 33 of the Oudh Rent Act, although he be recorded as an occupancy tenant in the village papers.

Appeal from the decree of the Commissioner, Lucknow, dated the 6th March 1916.

JUDGMENT.

HOLMS, S. M.—(July 22, 1916).—The appellant bases his objection to the suit for enhancement of rent as a tenant with a right of occupancy under section 33 of the Oudh Rent Act, on the ground that he is a holder of a heritable non-transferable lease held under a judicial decision and that, therefore, under section 79 of the Land Revenue Act his rent can only be enhanced at the revision of Settlement. Nothing in section 79 applies to rent payable by a tenant with a right of occupancy under the provisions of the Oudh Rent Act. Now, the appellant's predecessors were held to have a heritable and non-transferable right in the Settlement Court on 17th December 1870 at the time of the first Regular Settlement, and this is a judicial decision. It is clear from a perusal of the judgment that they are not held to have the rights of occupancy which were conferred by the section of the Rent Act of the time (XIX of 1868), which were equivalent to those in section 5 of the present Act. The respondent urges his objection to this view that the judicial decision contemplated in section 79 was a judicial decision prior to any Oudh Rent

Act at all; but I can find no authority for this contention. The application of section 79 of the Land Revenue Act to the present appeal does not seem to have been considered by the learned Commissioner.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of the Commissioner and restore that of the Assistant Collector, parties bearing their own costs in this and the Commissioner's Court, as the present appellant's failure to have his name recorded otherwise than as an occupancy tenant is largely responsible for the litigation.

A widow mortgaged certain lands of her husband by way of conditional sale in 1891. In 1901 she sold the land to the mortgagee in consideration of the mortgage money. More than twelve years after 1891 plaintiffs, as reversioners of the last male holder, sued for a declaration that the sale shall not affect their reversionary rights:

Held, (1) that the suit as regards the validity of the mortgage was barred under Article 125 of the Limitation Act, having been brought more than twelve years after the execution of the mortgage; [p. 64, col. 1.]

MEHDI HASAN KHAN v. BRIJ BHUSHAN MISRA.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal from the order of the lower Appellate Court, confirming the decree of the first Court declaring that a sale executed by Musammāt Lakhan on 25th April 1901 for a consideration of Rs. 1,500, shall not affect the plaintiff's reversionary rights.

Prior to the sale the land was mortgaged to the present vendee for the same sum of Rs. 1,500 with possession by deed of 9th July 1891. It has been held by the lower Appellate Court that there was consideration for the sale and mortgage.

It is contended by Counsel for appellant that if the sale had not taken place plaintiff would not have been in time to contest the mortgage under Article 125 of the 1st Schedule of the Limitation Act. The argument is correct and having regard to the principle enunciated in Khiali Ram v. Gulab Khan (1) plaintiff cannot now contest the necessity for the mortgage.

There was, however, no necessity for the sale; Musammāt Lakhan did not receive any consideration for converting the mortgage into a sale. Mr. Nanak Chand points out that the mortgage was by way of conditional sale and that Musammāt Lakhan was merely doing what might have been forced on her had the mortgagee instituted proceedings under Regulation XVII of 1806. He did not, however, institute any such proceedings and Musammāt Lakhan was under no necessity to convert the mortgage into a sale.

We, therefore, accept the appeal and modifying the order of the Courts below set aside the sale of the land, but declare that it shall be considered as mortgaged for Rs. 1,500 under the deed of 9th July 1891. Parties will bear their own costs in all the Courts.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 155—'Stranger', meaning of—Pre-emption.

The word "stranger" in section 155 of the Oudh Rent Act means a stranger with regard to the whole village, in other words, some body outside the village, not only some body outside the patti or mahal in which the land is situate. [p. 65, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Gonda, dated the 1st May 1916, confirming that of the Munsif, Gonda, dated the 14th March 1916.

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. K. Ghosh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts out of which this appeal arises are as follows:—

The village Rajwapur consists of two pattis, one is a twelve-annas patti known as patti Muhammad Hasan and the other a four-annas patti known as patti Mehdi Hasan Khan. Muhammad Hasan owned eight annas out of the twelve annas in patti Muhammad Hasan. Ramrup had interests in the twelve-annas patti. The four annas patti is owned by Mehdi Hasan Khan. Ramrup obtained a decree from the Rent Court against Muhammad Hasan. In execution of this decree he attached and brought to sale the eight-annas share of Muhammad Hasan. The sale took place on 21st December 1914. Mehdi Hasan Khan purchased the share. Brij Bhushan son of Ramrup claimed under the provisions of section 155, Act XXII of 1886, to purchase the share at the sum at which it had been knocked down. The sale officer rejected his claim. Brij Bhushan then instituted a suit in the Civil Courts for a declaration that he was entitled to take advantage of the provisions of section 155. If his suit were successful, the effect would be that the eight-annas share would pass into his possession. The Munsif passed a decree in his favour which has been upheld on appeal by the learned District Judge. Mehdi Hasan Khan comes here in second appeal

The right claimed by Brij Bhushan is under the provisions of section 155. The provisions of Chapter II of Act XVIII of 1876 have no bearing upon this case. Section 155 is as follows:—

“When land is sold in execution of a decree under this Act, and the land or any lot thereof has been knocked down to a stranger, any co-sharer, other than the judgment-debtor, may, before sunset on the day of sale, claim to take the land or lot, as the case may be, at the sum at which it was so knocked down.”

It is necessary for Brij Bhushan to establish in order to succeed that the purchaser Mehdi Hasan Khan is a stranger within the meaning of the section. Mehdi Hasan Khan as has already been stated owns one of the two pattis into which the village is divided. He has no interest in the patti in which the share sold is situated but he owns the other patti. Can it be said that he is a stranger? The learned Counsel for the respondent has argued that the word “stranger” means a stranger in respect of the land sold. Such an interpretation would, in my opinion, narrow the meaning of the word unjustifiably. The word “stranger” in this section means, according to the interpretation that I take, a stranger with regard to the village, in other words some body outside the village, not only some body outside the patti or mahal in which the land is situated. Section 14 of Act XXIII of 1861 (since repealed) read as follows:—

“When the land sold in execution of a decree is a share of a pattidari estate paying revenue to Government as defined in section 11, Act I of 1841,.....if the lot shall have been knocked down to a stranger, any co-sharer other than the judgment-debtor, or any other member of the co-parcenary, may claim to take the share sold at the sum at which the lot was knocked down.”

A Bench of the Allahabad High Court decided in Farzand Ali v. Alimullah (1), that a share-holder in one patti of a pattidari estate is not a “stranger” with reference to a share-holder in another patti of the estate within the meaning of that term in that section, and this decision supports the view at which I arrive with regard to the meaning of the word “stranger” in section 155, Act XXII of 1886. As Mehdi Hasan Khan was not a stranger no right under the provisions of section 155 accrued to anybody. The suit brought by Brij Bhushan must, therefore, fail. I allow the appeal and direct that the suit stand dismissed. Brij Bhushan will pay his own costs and those of the appellant Mehdi Hasan Khan in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VI, r. 17, s. 115—Plaint, amendment of—Revision—Interlocutory order—High Court, power of, to interfere.

The Chief Court has power to interfere in revision with interlocutory orders, but such power is exercised only in very exceptional cases, e. g., where the order is so unjust and is likely to put things into so inconvenient a position that irreparable harm would be done to the applicant for revision. [p. 66, cols. 1 & 2.]

Plaintiff brought a suit claiming certain shares in the property in dispute. Before issues were settled he filed an application under Order VI, rule 17, Civil Procedure Code, praying for leave to amend the plaint so as to increase the number of shares claimed. The lower Court rejected the application:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff should have been given leave to amend the plaint; [p. 66, col. 2.]

(2) that the Chief Court could interfere in revision with the order refusing leave to amend. [p. 66, cols. 1 & 2.]

Civil revision from the order of the Munsif, 1st Class, Jullundur, dated the 22nd December 1915.

Mr. Azim-ullah, for the Petitioner.

Mr. D. C. Khanna, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-petitioner in this case brought a suit in which he claimed certain shares in the property in dispute.

Before issues were settled he filed an application under Order VI, rule 17, Civil Procedure Code, praying for leave to amend his plaint so as to increase the number of shares claimed, i. e., from 1/16th to 2/16ths or 1/8th.

This application was opposed by the defendants-respondents and was refused on the 30th November 1915. An application for review of the order of refusal was made on the 18th December 1915, but was rejected on the 22nd December 1915.

The plaintiff has come up to this Court under section 44 of Act III of 1914 praying for a revision of the order of refusal. Mr. Khanna, for the respondents, urged that the order being an interlocutory one was not open to revision.

Mr. Azim-ullah, for the petitioner, has referred me to Gurdas v. Bhag (1) and Sevugan Chetty v. Krishna Aiyangar (2), as authorities for holding that an interlocutory order can be dealt with on the revision side.

These rulings certainly support the contention advanced but it is only in exceptional cases that the Court will interfere. In Saadat Sultan Begam v. Muhammad Munir Khan (3) and Nihala Mall v. Bogu Ram (4) it was held that interference on the revision side is permissible only when an interlocutory order is so unjust and is likely to put things into so inconvenient a position that irreparable harm would be done to the applicant for revision.

It would thus seem that this Court has the power to interfere with interlocutory orders, but will exercise that power only in very exceptional cases. [See also Khirode Chandra Ghoshal v. Saroda Prosad Mitra (5).] Is the present such a case? The plaint shows that the claim made is for less than what the plaintiff now says he is entitled to. A subsequent suit for the balance would be barred by limitation and also probably by Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code. The application for leave to amend was made before the issues had been settled and there seems to be no good reason why the learned Munsif should have declined to allow the amendment at that stage. In the circumstances I think the order refusing to allow the amendment was unsound and causes irreparable loss to the petitioner.

I accordingly accept this revision and set aside the order of the learned Munsif. I direct that the application be again heard and if at the date it was made the claim was within time, the amendment must be allowed. Parties will bear their own costs in this Court.

Revision accepted.

RAMESHWAR v. GAURI.

JUDGMENT.

HOLMS, S. M.—(August 7, 1917).—The respondent made an application which was really one under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act for specification of land in which he had ex-proprietary rights and fixation of rent thereon. The facts appear to be these. The appeal is as regards two plots only, Nos. 92 and 132. These plots among others were transferred by the sale-deed of the 9th June 1910. The respondent instead of applying within a year under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act instituted a suit under section 108 (10) of the Oudh Rent Act on the 24th April 1911 for recovery of possession of certain land in which he said he was an ex-proprietary tenant and from which he had been illegally ejected. The Assistant Collector held that the vendees, the present zemindars, had remained in possession of this land of which they were the former mortgagees even after the sale and that as no ex-proprietary rights had been settled under section 36 the then plaintiff had not been illegally ejected. Mutation proceedings followed and the present application under section 36 was not made until 19th November 1914. On the face of it, the 9th June 1910 must be taken as the date of the transfer unless good reason is shown to the contrary. I am unable to agree with the Commissioner who holds that the possession of the appellant as vendee did not begin till the 6th March 1914 when he applied for mutation. The mutation was simply a record of the transfer and not the transfer itself.

I hold then that the ex-proprietary rights were not claimed within a year from the time when they were created and that, therefore, having regard to Sultan Husain Khan v. Sewak Singh (1) the present application as regards the two plots under appeal is barred by limitation. I would, therefore, modify the orders of the lower Courts to this extent that the application so far as it concerns plots Nos. 92 and 132 is dismissed.

In the circumstances parties will bear their own costs in this appeal.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), Sch. II, Art. 35 (g)—Suit to recover money advanced as loan on condition of marriage—Jurisdiction.

A suit to recover money advanced by way of loan, on condition that the debtor would marry his daughter to the creditor's nephew and on failure to do so would pay back the money, falls under Article 35 (g), Schedule II, of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act and is, therefore, cognizable on the regular side. [p. 68, col. 1.]

Civil revision against the order of the District Judge, Gonda, dated the 30th August 1916, reversing that of the Munsif, Gonda, dated the 10th August 1916.

Babu Lachhman Das, for the Applicant.

Babu Gopal Sahai, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order passed by the learned District Judge of Gonda in appeal. The principal point involved is whether or not the suit which was brought by the plaintiff, opposite party, was exclusively cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. The suit was filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gonda as Judge of a Small Cause Court. He was of opinion that the suit was one to which the terms of Article 35, clause (g), of the second Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act applied. He, therefore, returned the plaint to the plaintiff and ordered him to present it to the Court of the Munsif in order that the case might be tried by the Munsif as a regular suit. The Munsif took a different view of the facts and being of opinion that the suit was exclusively cognizable by a Small Cause Court returned the plaint for presentation in the Small Cause Court presided over by the Subordinate Judge. This order was appealed to the District Judge. The learned District Judge held that the order of the Small Cause Court Judge was correct and he has, therefore, directed the Munsif to entertain the plaint and to proceed with the suit on the regular side. It is argued here in revision that the decision of the lower Appellate Court is wrong,

(1) 27 Ind. Cas. 586; Selected Decision No. 12 of 1914; 2 O. L. J. 11.

IMAM IBRAHIM v. BHAU APPAJI JADHAV.

that on the statements contained in the plaint it should be held that the money which the plaintiff was seeking to recover was money advanced by way of loan and that, therefore, the suit was cognizable only by a Court of Small Causes. The learned Counsel for the applicant maintains that Article 35, clause (g) of the second Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act has no application to the case. The learned Judge has referred in his judgment to several authorities. One case which is cited by him [Nura v. Aladitta (1)] is clearly against the applicant. There in a suit brought by the plaintiff to recover a sum of Rs. 150 in circumstances exactly similar to those of the present case it was held, on a reference made to the learned Judges of the Punjab Chief Court, that the case was one under Article 35, clause (g), of the second Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. I am not prepared to differ with the opinion of the learned District Judge in this case. It seems to me that it was open to him to treat this suit as a suit for compensation for a breach of the promise of marriage.

It is true that in the first paragraph of the plaint the plaintiff used the word "qarza" which literally interpreted might be taken to mean a loan, but having regard to the whole text of the first paragraph* it seems to me that the learned Judge was entitled to take up the position that there was a dealing between the parties which amounted to an agreement by which the amount of compensation for the breach of promise of marriage was fixed at the sum claimed by the plaintiff in the present suit. I am unable, therefore, to entertain the contention advanced on behalf of the applicant that the suit was exclusively cognizable by the Court of Small Causes. I refuse, therefore, to disturb the order of the learned District Judge and dismiss this application with costs.

Revision rejected.

JUDGMENT.

SCOTT, C. J.—We see no reason to differ from the conclusion by the learned Assistant Judge on the questions of res judicata and limitation.

The only other point arising on the appeal is whether the plaintiffs had an equity of redemption remaining in them, and that depends upon whether the rajinama or the series of rajinamas upon which the defendants rely required registration. The learned Assistant Judge observes:

"It is perfectly clear that the transactions with regard to the khata of the land which took place between 1875 and 1878 were intended to transfer ownership. Mutation of names was a well recognised means of transfer. Unfortunately for the defendants, rajinamas and kabuliyats in alienated villages had no legal standing at the time these transactions took place. Act I of 1865 did not apply to such villages. The rajinama by which Anandrao transferred his interest to the mamlatdar was, therefore, a document which required registration, and so it cannot be proved in Court. The result is no doubt unfortunate. The defendants who have all along supposed themselves to have an indefeasible title, now find themselves liable to be redeemed by the plaintiffs the conduct of whose predecessor-in-title appears to have been all along thoroughly dishonest. (See remarks by the District Judge in the judgment in the previous suit)."

The rajinamas upon which the defendants relied were three in number. First, there was a rajinama in 1875 by which the mortgagor Anandrao addressing the inamdar of the inam village stated that he gave notice that he had that day transferred his khata together with all the rights appertaining to the same to Jyoti bin Appaji Chavan residing at the place aforesaid. The rajinama was duly given in writing.

On the same day Jyoti Appaji addressed the inamdar stating that "the vahivat of the plot of land of the Government khata is entered in my name. I agree to that from this day's date. You will be pleased to enter my name in the Government record as the vahivatdar of this plot of land bearing the above-mentioned survey number in the place of Anandrao bin Mansingrao Jadhav. I hereby agree to pay all the arrears due to Government in respect of this survey number."

The inamdar was apparently the grantee of the assessment of the village which primarily was due to Government and was assigned by it to the inamdar, and although Act I of 1865 did not apply to alienated villages, it is evident from these documents that the *khata*s in which mutation of names was effected were kept in the alienated villages in the same way as in villages where there had been no alienation. If upon a transfer of the occupancy rights, the registered occupant did not provide for the mutation of names, he would be liable for the arrears of assessment, and all assessments falling due in future. By the kabuliyat the transferee of the occupancy right agrees to pay those arrears and to be liable in the future. The rajinama and the kabuliyat both in the case of Jyoti, and presumably in the subsequent documents of the same nature upon which the defendants relied, until the khata came to be registered in their name, are documents between the occupant and his superior holder, and not documents between the transferor and the transferee. They recite the transfer which has taken place presumably for consideration, but they themselves do not purport to operate as transferring any interest to another. If they fall within the terms of section 17 of the Indian Registration Act, it is because in some way they operate to extinguish an interest in immoveable property, either the interest of the occupant to remain on the khata upon the terms of paying the assessment, or the interest of the inamdar to receive the assessment from the particular khatedar. Assuming that by reason of such extinguishment they are documents of the nature aimed at by section 17 of the Indian Registration Act, registration is not necessary unless it is shown that the interest extinguished was of the value of Rs. 100 or upwards. Now the assessment to which the inamdar was entitled was an assessment of Rs. 18 a year, and there is no evidence as to the amount of any arrears of assessment which Jyoti undertook to discharge. There is nothing to show that the occupant could not relinquish his khata at any time, provided some other occupant was found to take over the liability of assessment. Therefore there is no reason to capitalize the assessment of Rs. 18 by any number of years' purchase, and this being so, it is impossible to hold that it is proved that the interest, if any, extinguished by the rajinama, is of the value of Rs. 100 or upwards. It is, therefore, not shown that the document is compulsorily registrable.

The learned Assistant Judge observes that "the transactions with regard to the khata of the land which took place between 1875 and 1878 were intended to transfer ownership." That is, I think, an inaccurate statement but in this inaccuracy the learned Judge does not stand alone, because similar inaccuracies of statement are to be found in judgments of the High Court over a series of years with reference to rajinamas and kabuliyats. It would, I think, be more accurate to say that rajinamas and kabuliyats, that is, transactions with regard to the khata, are the general accompaniment of transfers of ownership of occupancy rights. The transfer, however, of the beneficial ownership is a transaction not between the khatedar and his superior holder but the khatedar and the incoming occupant. At the time these transactions took place from 1875 to 1878, it was not necessary according to the law that there should be any document evidencing the transfer. Payment of price and delivery of possession completed the transaction. In the case of the owner of the equity of redemption, in property mortgaged with possession to the mortgagee, the only remaining outward symbol of ownership, as the learned Subordinate Judge has well put it, is the khata, and when the equity of redemption is transferred, arrangements are made for mutation of names, so that the khata or the outward symbol of ownership, would be in the transferee of the equity of redemption. That is the explanation the rajinamas and kabuliyats which resulted in the claim of the defendants to hold the equity of redemption as well as the rights of the mortgagee. The rajinamas and kabuliyats are good evidence of the transfers having taken place as the defendants claim, since they contain the admission of the transferors and as it is not shown that they required registration, we are able to decide in accordance with what the Assistant Judge was convinced was the justice of the case. We hold that the defendants are shown to be the owners of the equity of redemption, and therefore, the plaintiffs' suit to redeem must fail. We set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

BEAMAN, J.—I concur.

I take this, the earliest opportunity, of correcting a recent judgment I delivered in the case of Vinayak Hari Paranjpe v. Navaji Parsu Kapse, unreported S. A. No. 87 of 1915. In the light of the fuller argument we have had in this case, and the many difficulties it has revealed, I realize that in one passage I used much too loose and general language. I should have said that the conjoint effect of a rajinama and a kabuliyat, between a mortgagor and a mortgagee or between a mortgagor and a third party, was to indicate that in the first case the equity of redemption had been extinguished, that in the second case, it had been transferred. The fact would, I believe, always be found to be so, though since the actual extinction or transfer must ex hypothesi have been effected either orally or by another writing, it is by no means so clear that the fact could always be proved. In the present case I see no reason in law to prevent it. I do not wish to add an unnecessary word to the full explanatory analysis of the true content, and the legal limits to be put upon the scope and effect of such papers, and the statement of the resultant law governing this, and all like cases, in the judgment of the Chief Justice. I am satisfied that it is accurate and must supersede much confusion of thought or expression or both to be found in earlier judgments. It makes this point, which is of capital importance in deciding the case before us, quite clear, that rajinamas and kabuliyats can never be in themselves documents of transfer between the parties, respectively giving them to the Government or other over-lord.

Decree set aside.

Mortgage—Suit by mortgagee to recover mortgage-debt
—Mortgagee unable to restore possession of mortgaged 1882), s. 76—Mortgage accounts.

There is no authority for the broad proposition that if the mortgagee cannot for any reason put the mortgagor in possession of the whole of the mortgaged property, he cannot recover the mortgage-debt. [p. 71, col. 1.]

NANDI v. SARUP LAL.

If owing to the fact that there have been acquisitions of the mortgaged property under the Land Acquisition Act, or other causes, there is some difficulty in identifying the mortgaged property, or if after identification the mortgagee is unable to give possession of the whole of the mortgaged property owing to some default on his part, the proper course is to debit the mortgagee with the value of the land in taking the mortgage accounts under section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Calicut, in Appeal Suit No. 625 of 1913, preferred against that of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Calicut, in Original Suit No. 181 of 1912.

Mr. K. P. M. Menon, for the Appellant.

Messrs. C. V. Anantha Krishna Aiyar and P. V. Parameswara Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is contended for the appellants that if the mortgagee is not in a position to put the mortgagor in possession of the whole of the mortgaged property, he cannot recover the mortgage debt. In England, if the mortgagee after foreclosure seeks to enforce the personal covenant, he thereby re-opens the mortgage and gives the mortgagor a right to redeem, that is to say, to recover the mortgaged property on payment of what is due. If after foreclosure the mortgagee has alienated the property, so as to put it out of his power to put the mortgagor in possession on redemption, the Courts do not allow the mortgagee to enforce the personal covenant, as he cannot restore the property to the mortgagor. Lockhart v. Hardy (1) and Palmer v. Hendrie (2). We do not think these cases are authority for the broad proposition that if the mortgagee cannot for any reason put the mortgagor in possession of the whole of the mortgaged property, he cannot recover the mortgage debt. In the present case, owing possibly to the fact that there have been acquisitions under the Land Acquisition Act or other causes, it appears there has been some difficulty in identifying the item of property in question, in this suit.

(1) (1846) 9 Beav. 349; 10 Jur. 532; 15 L. J. Ch 247; 50 E. R. 378; 73 R. R. 379.

(2) (1859) 27 Beav. 349; 54 E. R. 136; 122 R. R. 426.

Even so, we think the proper course is to debit the mortgagee with the value of the land in taking the mortgage accounts under section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act, if it is found that the property cannot be identified. We also think the same course should be adopted if after identification the mortgagee is unable to give possession owing to some default on his part. We think, however, that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in leaving that matter to be dealt with in execution and we must set aside his decree and remand the case for disposal according to law. Fresh evidence may be taken by the Subordinate Judge. There will be no order as to costs of this appeal or the memorandum of objections. Other costs are to be dealt with by the Subordinate Judge.

Decree set aside; Case remanded.

Hindu Law—Co-widows—Sale of house by one co-widow—Improvements by vendee—Death of vendor—House reverting to other co-widow—Vendee, right of, to compensation.

Where a transferee of a house from a co-widow chooses to spend a large sum of money upon the house, he does so at his peril and is not entitled to the amount so spent on the house reverting to the other co-widow on the death of the vendor co-widow. [p. 72, col. 2.]

First appeal from the order of District Judge, Meerut, dated the 13th September 1916.

Dr. S. N. Sen, for Mr. N. Upadhyaya, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for possession of a house. It appears that the house originally belonged to Tara Chand who died leaving two widows and no male issue. The name of one of the widows was Musammât Bakhti. The name of the other widow was Musammât Nandi, the plaintiff. These two ladies made a partition of Tara Chand's property as between themselves. The house in question fell to the lot of Bakhti. Bakhti executed a sale-deed of the house to the defendant on the 29th of April 1898. Bakhti has now died and the plaintiff has brought this suit to recover possession of the house. The case has come right up to this Court on a previous occasion but finally the Court of first instance found that there was no legal necessity for the sale made by Musammât Bakhti. It appears that after the sale a considerable amount of money was spent in improvements on the house. In the Court of first instance there was an issue as to who had spent the money, and the Court found that it had been expended out of the money which belonged to Musammât Bakhti. The Court decreed the plaintiff's suit. On appeal the lower Appellate Court held in agreement with the Court of first instance that there was no legal necessity for the sale but came to the conclusion that the defendant had improved the house out of his own money, and for some reason or other remanded the case to the Court of first instance. The present appeal has been preferred on behalf of the plaintiff who contends that even on the finding that the house had been improved out of moneys belonging to the defendant, the plaintiff's suit should have been decreed and there was no necessity for a remand. We must, of course, accept the finding of the lower Appellate Court as to where the money came from which went to improve the house. At the same time we feel some doubt as to whether the Court of first instance did not arrive at the right conclusion even on this issue of fact. It is somewhat improbable that the defendant spent out of his own money this large sum of money upon the house, his title to which he must have known was most infirm and could only last for the period of Musammât Bakhti's life. Furthermore, Musammât Bakhti undoubtedly had some money which might have been expended upon the house. Eventually what has become of this money we do not know. accepting, however, as we are bound to do, the finding of the lower Appellate Court that the defendant expended the money out of his own pocket, in our opinion it affords no answer to the present suit. If the defendant chose to spend money on the house he did at his peril. It is quite clear that the partition between the two ladies operated merely during their life and upon the death of Musammât Bakhti the property became the property of the surviving widow for the period of her life. We allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court below and restore the decree of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Pandit Rambhaji Datta for the Appellant.

Mr. Kanwar Narain, for Rai Bahadur Pandit Sheo Narain and Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The point of custom certified by the Divisional Judge is whether on the death of a daughter of a donee, her property (out of the gift) should revert to the donor's collaterals rather than be inherited by other descendants of the donee, MAHABALI v. SAHDEO.

The Divisional Judge did not decide whether the property was ancestral as to the plaintiff, but proceeded on the assumption that it was so.

Of course, if it is not, the plaintiff has no right to it in the presence of nearer relatives of the donee.

In appeal before us the main contention is that the gift to Musammatt Jijo merely accelerated the succession for in this family daughters succeed to their father and Musammatt Jijo would in the ordinary course of things have succeeded the donor, her father.

If daughters, however, succeed their father, they either act as conduits to the next male descendant in which case Niaz Ali has a better claim than the plaintiff or they hold absolutely.

Now Musammatt Jijo treated the property as her own absolute property, for in 1876 she died having bequeathed her property to three daughters and a grand-daughter who have accordingly enjoyed the property, since that date.

Niaz Ali is a lineal descendant of the donee and there are several authorities for the view that no reversion of the gifted property to donor's line takes place until the donee's line is extinguished.

The decisions of this Court on the point have not always been consistent; the first rulings held gifts to daughters to be absolute, the pandulum then swung back and they were held to be for the benefit of the daughters' male issue, but the property gifted remained ancestral qua the donor's collaterals subsequently the course of decision has been that the presence of even females of the donee's line would bar a reversion to the donor's branch so that in fact the donor's branch comes in only just before the Government or any other body to which the estate would otherwise escheat.

The whole matter was reviewed in Shahanchi Khan v. Begam Jan (1) and though, of course, the position is illogical, we see no reason for refusing to follow that decision. The appellant urges that in Jannat v. Abdulla (2) it was held that the female descendant of the donee must be an heir of the last male holder and it is not sufficient that she should be merely a descendant of the donee.

That case, however, was not decided on that point, which does not appear to have been very fully argued.

In this particular case, moreover, Musammatt Jijo and her descendants appear to have treated the donated property as their own absolute property and to have enjoyed it not as heirs but as donees.

In our opinion the dismissal of plaintiff's suit by the lower Courts was correct and we dismiss this appeal likewise with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

custom. He had to prove a custom which gave him a right to be substituted for the mortgagee. The lower Appellate Court has found that he has not established the existence of such a custom. We find that there was an entry in respect of pre-emption the wajib-ul-arz of 1840. This recorded a right in the case of mortgage to lambardars and to co-sharers. The entry in the wajib-ul-arz of 1882 is of a totally different nature. In the first place it does not refer to mortgages at all. Lambardars are dropped out altogether and the right is given to an own brother (apparently irrespective of whether he is a co-sharer or not) and then to near relations, then to co-sharers in the same lambardari, and then to other co-sharers. We think that the Court below was justified under these circumstances in holding that the plaintiff had not established the existence of the custom which it was necessary for him to prove. So far as the finding is a finding of fact it is binding upon us in second appeal. We dismiss the appeal with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

JUDGMENT.

WALMSLEY, J.—The suit from which this appeal arises was instituted by two Hindu gentlemen with the permission of the Advocate-General in regard to a piece of land which they described as a public highway, and the relief for which they asked is in the terms of form No. 31 in Appendix A of the Civil Procedure Code. The defendant, now appellant, is a Marwari who has built a temple on land immediately adjoining the strip which the plaintiffs say is a public highway.

The learned Subordinate Judge in the first Court found that the plaintiffs had proved their case, and granted them a decree, and this decision was confirmed by the learned District Judge in appeal.

The first argument pressed in support of the appeal is that the plaintiffs could not sue under section 91, Civil Procedure Code, because the land lies within the area of the Calcutta Municipality and reference is made to section 336 of the Calcutta Municipal Act which declares that: "All public streets * * * including the soil * * * shall rest in and belong to the Corporation."

The defendant has no authority to quote in support of this argument and we have to read the two sections together, and consider whether section 336 of Act III of 1899 imposes any limitation on section 91, Civil Procedure Code. For my part I cannot see anything to suggest such a limitation. Section 91 of the Civil Procedure Code is extremely broad in its terms, and if it had been intended to exclude from its scope cases in which a local authority, such as a Municipal Committee or a District Board, might be regarded as competent to safeguard the interests of the public it would have been very easy to insert words to that effect. As the section stands it does not matter where the alleged public nuisance is situated. Any two persons, provided they obtain the Advocate-General's consent in writing, may sue for its removal. Again the other section, section 326 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, merely vests the proprietary right in the soil of highways in the Corporation: but it does not add that in case of obstruction the Corporation alone shall have the right to sue for the removal of the obstruction. In my opinion, therefore, there is no weight in this first argument.

Next it is urged that the dedication to the public use on which the plaintiffs rely is invalid, and this argument has several branches. It is said that the Courts below have not found when the dedication did take place, that the dedication cannot have been earlier than July 27th 1893 when a letter, Exhibit 6, was addressed to the Secretary of the Corporation by Buddh Singh, Bishan Chand and Budree Das, that in 1893 the signatories to that letter were incompetent to make the dedication because they had previously entered into an oral contract with the defendant's father respecting the land, and that in any case such dedication was invalid because there was no acceptance by the Corporation.

Lastly it was urged that the lower Courts were wrong in holding that the oral agreement set up by defendant was inoperative because it was not reduced to writing.

One of these points may be disposed of at once, that is the objection that acceptance by the Corporation was necessary to make the dedication operative. The learned Vakil can refer us to no authority for this proposition, while on the other hand, there is the statement in paragraph 43 of the Article on Highways in Lord Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 16, that: "Acceptance by the public requires no formal act of adoption by any persons or authority but is to be inferred from public user of the way." It may be added here that although there was no formal acceptance the lower Courts have found that the lighting, repairing, watering and scavenging of the alleged highway was carried out by the Corporation.

Now let us turn to the time and fact of dedication. In this Court it is conceded that a letter in the terms of Exhibit 6 was written in July 1893 to the Secretary to the Corporation. That letter speaks of the road as having been used by the public for about six years. The learned Subordinate Judge does not record an exact finding as to the year in which the public began to use the strip of land, but he points out that one of the two highways which it connects was constructed in 1886. The lower Appellate Court, however, records very clear findings on this point: and says more than once that the public began to use the land as a passage in about 1887. Paragraphs 51 and 52 of the Article already mentioned deal with user as evidence of dedication. On the definite finding of user since 1887, I do not think that the dedication must be regarded as made in July 1893 when the letter Exhibit 6 was written. Without that letter the evidence of user since 1887 is enough to justify the inference of a dedication in 1887, and the letter with its reference to six years' user corroborates that evidence. It must be remembered that the defendant offers no evidence to rebut the inference, but contents himself with pleading that certainly before 1893 possibly before 1887, the signatories had parted with their rights in the land.

The remaining question, therefore, relates to this alleged agreement of 1887 or thereabouts. The evidence of this alleged agreement is to be found in Exhibit D, a deed of gift executed in 1911 by Budh Singh and the son of Bishan Chand in favour of the defendant. Regarding this document and its allegation of a previous agreement, the learned District Judge holds that Exhibit C is not operative because the signatures of the executants have not been properly attested, that the alleged gift could not be made except by a registered document, and that by the very words of Exhibit C, the ownership of the land remained with the executants up to 1911. The first of these objections is fatal: one executant signed the document at Calcutta and the other at Azimganj and one witness only attested each signature. The third objection is equally fatal to the defendant's assertion that the dedicators were not competent to dedicate, for they say in the document that they are in possession and this is borne out, as the lower Court's remark, by their possession of the title-deeds. In regard to the second objection the learned Vakil has urged that there was a sort of exchange between the parties in 1887 and that no document was necessary. But this attitude is inconsistent with Exhibit D for the executants convey the property by way of free gift. If the appellant received the property by way of free gift in 1911, it is clear that there can have been no operative agreement concluded in 1887.

In my opinion none of the arguments put forward on behalf of the appellant has any substance and I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

D. CHATTERJEE, J.—I agree.

THE COLLECTOR OF BAREILLY—

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), s. 9, cl. (3)—“To the same effect”, meaning of—Notice—Time, whether allowable.

The words “to the same effect” in clause (3) of section 9 of the Land Acquisition Act mean that the second notice should have the same matters mentioned in it including the time, as are mentioned in the first notice. [p. 76, col. 2.]

Therefore, in the second notice under clause (3) of section 9 of the Land Acquisition Act to the occupier of the land 15 days should also be allowed to enable the occupier to make his objections. [p. 76, col. 2.]

First appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Bareilly, dated the 3rd September, 1915.

Mr. U. S. Bajpai, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act. The learned District Judge has affirmed the award of the Collector on the sole ground that the appellant did not state “the nature of his interest in the land and the particulars of his claim to compensation for such interest” by way of objection under section 9, clause (2), of the Land Acquisition Act. He appears to have considered that such objection not having been put forward he was justified, (if not bound), under section 25 to affirm the award of the Collector. Section 9 of the Land Acquisition Act provides that the Collector must cause public notice to be given at convenient places at or near the land to be taken stating that the Government intends to take possession of the land and claims to compensation for all interest in such land may be made to him. Clause 2 prescribes what the notice shall state and amongst other things that the notice shall require all persons interested in the land to appear before the Collector at a time mentioned in the notice. It has expressly provided that the time shall not be earlier than 15 days after the publication of the notice. In the present case the publication of the notice was on the 18th of July and the date required for appearance before the Collector was the 24th of July—clearly a much shorter period than that prescribed by the section. Clause (3) provides for a second notice which is to be served on the occupier of the land and which is to the same effect as the notice prescribed by clause (2). In the present case this personal notice was served on the 16th of July. This also is less than 15 days. The learned Judge seems to have thought that because the personal notice was served, the first notice was unnecessary, and as no time was prescribed in the second notice the appellant is not entitled to complain that the notice served on him gave him less than 15 days to make his objection. We think that the learned Judge was wrong in the view he took. In the first place the Act requires that two notices are to be served, and accordingly the service of the first notice containing what is prescribed by the section was absolutely necessary. We think also that the 15 days ought to be allowed by the second notice. There is no reason why the occupier should not have some time allowed him within which to make his objection as other persons. We think that the words “to the same effect” in clause (3) really mean that the second notice should have the same matters mentioned in it including the time as is in the first notice. The learned District Judge should, therefore, have tried the case and considered the evidence, and the appellant ought to be considered as having had sufficient reason for not filing his objections before the Collector. We allow the appeal, set aside the order of the learned District Judge and remand the case to him with directions to re-admit the case on its original number on the file and proceed to hear and determine the same on the merits having regard to what we have said above. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal including fees on the higher scale.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 1, s. 115—Leave to withdraw with liberty to bring fresh suit—Insufficient grounds—Revision—High Court, interference by.

The mere fact that the Primary Court granted leave to a plaintiff, to withdraw from his suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action on insufficient grounds is no ground for the High Court's interference in revision under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, unless the lower Court in granting leave acted without jurisdiction or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

Rule issued against the order of the Munsif, First Court, Kandi, in Mortgage Suit No. 1008 of 1915.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Bemal Ohandra Deb, for the Petitioner.—The plaintiff brought a mortgage suit against the defendant admittedly twelve years after the execution of the mortgage, but in order to save limitation she alleged payment of interest within twelve years. But the whole evidence of the plaintiff did not disclose any payment of interest. After the evidence for the plaintiff was finished the Munsif called upon the defendant-petitioner to adduce evidence in support of his case. She did not do so but asked the Court to dismiss the plaintiff's suit as being prima facie barred by limitation. Thereafter the plaintiff seeing the defect in his case filed an application for withdrawing the suit with liberty to institute a fresh suit and the Munsif allowed his application. I submit that the Munsif improperly exercised his jurisdiction in allowing the plaintiff to withdraw his suit under Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, without assigning any reason whatsoever and your Lordships should set aside that order in revision. He should have dismissed the suit as being prima facie barred by limitation under section 3 of the Limitation Act. The plaintiff should not have been allowed to withdraw from the suit simply because he failed to prove his case. See Order XXIII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code. The Munsif exercised in this case a jurisdiction not vested in him by law.

Babu Sajani Kanta Sinha, for the Opposite Party, was not called upon in reply.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is a Rule calling on the opposite party to show cause why the order complained of should not be set aside. The plaintiff opposite party brought a suit to enforce a mortgage. A question was raised as to whether the plaintiff could be successful and the plaintiff applied to the learned Judge for permission to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring another suit on the same cause of action which the learned Judge granted. The learned Judge under the terms of the rule clearly had power to grant the plaintiff permission to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit at any stage of the proceeding. The mere fact that the learned Judge granted that leave on a ground that may or may not appear to us to be sufficient is no ground for interfering under the terms of section 115, Code of Civil Procedure. This is not a case of want of jurisdiction nor did the learned Judge act with material irregularity. The Rule is discharged with costs—one gold mohur.

SMITHER, J.—I agree.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Canara, in Appeal No. 208 of 1913, reversing the decree passed by the Additional Subordinate Judge, Karwar, in Civil Suit No. 152 of 1912.

Mr. G. S. Mulgaokar, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. V. Palekar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question here is as to the inheritance to the property of a naikin or prostitute dancing girl. The competition is between the daughter and the son, and the learned District Judge has held that the daughter is the sole heir.

Mr. Mulgaokar, who appears for the son, has referred us to numerous decisions of the High Courts. But the only decision which is strictly in point is that of Kamakshi v. Nagarathnam (1) and there the learned Judges in a similar case held that the daughters are preferential heirs over the sons. The books have been searched on both sides, but neither learned Pleader is able to point to any decision of any High Court in which the ruling in Kamakshi's case (1) has been differed from or questioned. This ruling is in accordance with the observation in Steele's Laws and Customs of Hindu Castes, at page 181, where we read: "Children of dancing girls are of their mother's caste... Daughters inherit the mother's property in preference to sons." We are the more ready to give effect to this opinion in the present case because it comes from the district of Canara, and at page 89, section 361, of Strange's Manual of Hindu Law as prevailing in the Presidency of Madras, it is stated that "the property of a dancing girl will pass to her female issue first, and then to her male, as in the case of other females." Now at the time Strange's Manual was published, what is now the Bombay District of Canara formed part of the Madras Presidency, and there is no reason to doubt that the customs incident to naikins in the Canara District are indistinguishable from those observed by similar classes further south.

On the whole, therefore, the present state of the law is in favour of the view taken by the learned District Judge whose decree must be confirmed with costs, this appeal being dismissed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182—Execution—Decree, ex parte, satisfaction of, against one judgment-debtor—Decree set aside as against that judgment-debtor—Application for execution—Limitation.

When an ex parte decree which has been executed against one of the judgment-debtors is set aside in suit by that judgment-debtor and the money realised in execution is ordered to be refunded, a further application of the decree-holder, on the date on which the ex parte decree is set aside, to execute the decree against the other judgment-debtor must be treated as a continuation of the original application for execution which was made within time. ing the order of the Munsif of Lakhimpur. The proceedings arise out of an application for execution of a decree. The decree was obtained as long ago as the 17th June 1910. It was an ex parte decree obtained against the present appellant and another person named Sangsar-ud-Din, his co-defendant. The decree-holder, respondent before us then applied for execution against Sangsar-ud-Din and brought to sale in execution the moveables of Sangsar-ud-Din on the 15th April 1913 and the whole decree was satisfied from the proceeds of such sale. On the 16th June 1913, Sangsar-ud-Din sued to set aside the ex parte decree and that suit was decreed on the 26th June 1914. On the same date on which that suit was decreed, the decree-holder applied for execution against the appellant, the other judgment-debtor, and the application having been refused by the Munsif, on appeal to the District Judge, the order was reversed and execution was directed to issue. The only point is whether that application was made within time. The matter seems to be one of first impression. The view that the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court appears to have taken was that the order directing refund by the decree-holder to Sangsar-ud-Din in effect re-opened the execution proceedings and that the present application must be treated as a continuation of the original application for execution which was brought within time. We think, on the whole, that the view taken by the learned Judge was correct and we ought to affirm his order. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee as two gold mohurs.

Civil review in Appeal No. 406 of 1913 against the judgment of the Sub-Judge of Shahabad.

Messrs. Hasan Imam, and Naresh Ch. Sinha, for the Appellants.

Mr. Pugh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—This suit came before my learned colleague and myself in June of last year; and we dismissed this action on the ground of defective joinder of parties. It was argued and contended before us that the suit was not properly constituted inasmuch as two persons named Kazi Akbar Ali and Kazi Amjad Ali who were brothers of the second wife of the original mortgagee had not been made parties to the suit.

Having regard to the frame of the suit and to paragraph 4 of the written statement we held that the plaintiff ought to have joined these two persons as parties.

This application is now made to us to review our judgment on two grounds.

First, it is contended that the two persons named in paragraph 4 of the written statement are not necessary parties inasmuch as, by a document, dated the 3rd October 1912, they relinquished any right which they might have had in the property of Shaikh Elahi Buksh, the mortgagee, through his second wife, and that if they had any right through her they assigned their right to the plaintiff No. 1, who is the son of the original mortgagee.

Secondly, it is urged that these parties, even if necessary parties could have been joined inasmuch as there was an acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act which would have saved limitation; and that thus if we considered that these two persons were necessary parties the joinder could have been made within limitation.

BHAGELA KUER v. ABDUL RAHMAN.

In support of the ground of limitation reference is made to an application filed by defendant No. 1 for a certificate of guardianship, schedule B of which shows the debts due by her husband's estate—the husband being the original mortgagor.

In this schedule appears, as item No. 5, the debt due to the mortgagees in this case. It is contended that this is an acknowledgment within the meaning of the Indian Limitation Act and that it saves limitation and it is urged that if these two persons ought properly to have been joined as parties they could have been joined inasmuch as there was an acknowledgment in the application of the defendant No. 1 of the debt due to the plaintiff which satisfies the requirements of the Limitation Act. The date of the application was the 6th September 1910; and it is, therefore, urged that the plaintiffs could even now have added these parties as plaintiffs within time. We agree in thinking that this argument is well founded and correct.

However, the more material ground is the argument that the plaintiff was misled owing to the form in which the learned Judge in the lower Court had decided the question as to whether the two persons named in paragraph 4 of the written statement were the heirs of the deceased.

No doubt these persons are not heirs, legally entitled to share with the others, as heirs of the deceased; but we think that there was material to lead the plaintiff to believe that it had been decided that these persons were not heirs of the deceased mortgagee and consequently that they need not have been joined as parties.

It now transpires that after the institution of the suit on the 3rd October 1910 the plaintiff procured a deed from these two persons relinquishing and assigning to him all their interest in these properties and the plaintiff now seeks to rely upon this deed for the purpose of showing that these persons are not necessary parties; and that consequently the suit should not have been dismissed on the ground of defective joinder of parties.

Mr. Pugh contends very strongly that the plaintiff's application cannot come within the purview of Order XLVII, rule 1, inasmuch as they have not shown that the document they now rely on could not have been produced at the trial or before us after the exercise of due diligence since the deed of the 3rd of October 1912 was in their possession; and the plaintiffs must be deemed to have withheld this document deliberately in the face of the pleadings in the suit.

Undoubtedly there was gross neglect on the part of the plaintiff in this case in not producing the document they now rely on, but we think that where the document which is subsequently produced shows (as it does in this case) that an injustice has been done, the interest of justice demands that the party to whom the injustice has been done should be granted a review. This well settled principle of law and practice was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in a case reported as In the matter of the petition of Hadjee Abdoollah Reasut Hossein v. Hadjee Abdoollah (1), their Lordships say: "Looking to the extreme generality of the terms used in these sections, particularly to these terms 'other good and sufficient reason' and 'necessary to correct an evident error or omission, or is otherwise requisite for the ends of justice,' they are not prepared to say that there is an absolute defect of jurisdiction whenever the parties have failed to show that there was either positive error in law, or new evidence to be brought forward which could not be brought forward on the first hearing."

This was a registered document registered on the very day it was executed and it has in no way been impugned as false or fraudulent. It was not produced earlier owing to the negligence or oversight on the part of the plaintiff himself who was misled by the decision of the Subordinate Judge and who failed to inform his legal advisers of its existence.—If produced the suit would not have been dismissed.

We think that the plaintiff has shown a sufficient reason for granting this application and we accordingly grant it.

It will be necessary to remand the case to the lower Court with a direction to accept evidence of the due execution of this document of the 3rd of October 1912, and to receive same in evidence when it will be admitted on the record.

At the original hearing my learned colleague and I held different views upon the question as to the necessity for adducing evidence of the proof of the debt; but Mr. Justice Jwala Prasad agrees that as the case must go back to the lower Court upon the question of proof and admission of the deed of 3rd October 1912, it should also be referred to the Judge to ascertain by legal proof what amount is now due and owing to the plaintiffs by the defendant on foot of the mortgage bond in suit.

We will accordingly direct the learned Subordinate Judge to ascertain the sum due and owing to the plaintiffs on foot of the mortgage bond, dated the 4th of September 1897. In doing so the learned Subordinate Judge should have regard to the well established principle of law that strict proof is necessary in the case of a creditor seeking to establish a debt against the estate of a deceased person.

We regret to have to observe that the generous offer for settlement made on behalf of the plaintiff by Mr. Hassan Imam on Saturday last has been so unworthily declined.

Inasmuch as the plaintiffs are responsible for this review and the appeal proving abortive before us, we feel that it is right and proper that they should pay the costs of the defendants in this Court as well as the costs before the Subordinate Judge and also a fee of three gold mohurs as the costs of this application.

Arbitration Act (IX of 1899), s. 19—'Step in the proceedings', what amounts to.

Any application whatsoever to the Court, even though it be merely an application for time, is a 'step in the proceedings', within the meaning of section 19 of the Arbitration Act, irrespective of the intention with which the application is made. [p. 82, col. 1.]

Even a mere acquiescence in a proceeding initiated by the other party and in an order made on his separate application amounts to a 'step in the proceedings'. [p. 82, col. 1.]

Mr. T. G. Elphinston, for the Applicants.

Mr. Nadirshah Noaroji, for the Opponent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under section 19 of the Arbitration Act to stay a suit which was filed against the applicant on the 16th August last on the ground that the agreement between the parties, on which the suit was filed, provided that any dispute whatsoever in connection with it should be referred to arbitration.

The suit was filed on the 16th of August, and summons was ordered to issue for the framing of issues on the 6th of September. On the 6th of September, the applicants appeared before the Small Cause Court by their Pleader Mr. Pamanmal, who admits that he applied for a postpone-ment on the ground that the documents relating to the suit had to be discovered and the time allowed had been too short to permit of this being done. On Mr. Pamanmal's application and with the consent of the opponent the Court adjourned the hearing until the 25th of September. On referring to the documents the applicants say that they noticed the arbitration clause in the indent and then made this application on the 22nd of September, three days before the date to which the Small Cause Court suit had been adjourned.

Mr. Nadirshah contends, and I think rightly, that the present application is barred by the reason of application made to the Small Cause Court on the 6th of September for an adjournment.

The application for time seems to me to be clearly a step in the proceedings and it is pointed out in the case of Sarat Kumar Roy v. Corporation of Calcutta (1) that this is so, irrespective of the intention with which the application was made. Whether the applicant wished to have further time to file a written statement or wished to have further time to raise as a bar to the suit the agreement to refer to arbitration, in either event the application was an application to invite the Court to do something which would enable the applicant to establish his defence.

Mr. Elphinston relies on a passage in the judgment of Denman, J., in the case of Chappell v. North (2) to the effect that a mere consent to what may afterwards lead to a step is not of itself a "step" in the proceedings. But it is pointed out in the case of Bartlett v. Ford's Hotel Company (3) that the consent referred to was a consent given without the intervention of the Court. The application was to the other party and not to the Court.

The later English cases go even further and establish that mere acquiescence in a proceeding initiated by the other party and in an order made on his separate application does amount to a step in the proceedings: County Theatres and Hotels, Limited v. Knowles (4). Lord Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume I, paragraph 956, summarises the law on the subject as follows: "A party who makes any application whatsoever to the Court, even though it be merely an application for time, takes a step in the proceedings". This seems to me to be also the law here and this application must, therefore, fail.

Application rejected.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), ss. 42 (2), 77 (1), 26 (3)—Increase in area, discovery of, on re-survey—Enhanced rent, suit for, maintainability of.

No suit lies for enhanced rent for an increase in the area of a holding discovered on re-survey except on an order of the Collector under section 42 (2) of the Madras Estates Land Act. [p. 82, col. 2; p. 83, col. 1.]

Per Napier, J.—Section 26 (3) only gives the landlord the right to claim to revert to the old rate and compels the Collector, in a suit under section 56, to decree it. It is not in the power of the Court in a rent suit to cancel an existing patta, and, until that is done, it constitutes the contract between the parties. [p. 83, col. 1.]

Mr. P. C. Desikachariar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—The suit out of which this second appeal arises is one for arrears of rent under section 77 (1) of Act I of 1908. The rent sued for is in excess of that paid in previous faslis, the difference being due to an increase in wet area discovered by re-survey. The District Judge has disposed of the appeal on the short ground that the suit for excess rent will not lie, until the landlord has obtained an order of the Collector under section 42 (2) sanctioning the enhancement.

I think he is right. Section 42 declares that no alteration of rent in respect of an alteration in area shall be given effect to, except under an order of the Collector passed on an application made to him for that purpose. Admittedly there has been no such application here. The ryot is, therefore, not liable to pay the additional rent claimed.

The question of whether a suit for enhanced rent (whatever be the cause of enhancement) can be brought without first enforcing the acceptance of a patta embodying the enhanced rent, on which a long argument was addressed to us, does not really arise in this case.

I would dismiss the second appeal with costs.

NAPIER, J.—The lower Appellate Court has dismissed the claim for excess rent, holding that it falls within the mischief of section 42 (2) of Act I of 1908. The appellant urges that he is protected by section 26 (3), that the old paimash rate is the lawful rate and that the landholder who granted the lower rate being dead, he is entitled to sue for it without suing for a patta under section 56. I am strongly inclined to think that whereas in this case there is in existence a patta and muchilika at the lower rate, these terms must be altered either by exchange or by a decree under section 56 before the landlord is entitled to sue for the rent. It seems to me that the old patta remains in force, "fresh pattas neither having been accepted, exchanged or decreed." Section 26 (3), I think, only gives him the right to claim to revert to the old rate and compels the Collector in a suit under section 56 to decree it. I do not think that it is in the power of the Court in a rent suit to cancel the old patta and until that is done, it constitutes the contract between the parties. Whether this be so or not, I do not see why we should not accept the footing on which the suit has been decided in both Courts, namely, that the claim is made in consequence of re-survey as the plaint does not allege the facts necessary to bring the case within section 26 (3). The fact of re-survey is admitted and the case, therefore, falls within section 42 (2). I, therefore, agree that this second appeal be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Per Beaman, J.—A fact which does not necessarily constitute a term, in any real sense, of a contract, grant, or other disposition of property, may be proved, although the writing in which the terms of that contract, grant, or disposition of property are embodied cannot be proved for want of registration. JUDGMENT.

SCOTT, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover possession of certain property, Survey Nos. 535 and 545, and to have a perpetual injunction restraining defendant No. 2 from taking possession of Survey No. 544 and from using the water of the well, alleging that his father left two brothers out of whom one Chhaganlal died in 1897 leaving no issue, while the other brother died in union with him, the plaintiff, in 1905, that defendant No. 3 and he were heirs in joint undivided property under Hindu Law, and that defendant No. 1, the widow of Girdharlal, the uncle who died in 1905, had only a right of maintenance, and he sought to set aside a sale which had been made in favour of defendant No. 2 by defendant No. 1, Girdharlal's widow.

CHHOTLAL ADITRAM TRAVADI v. BAI MAHAKORE.

The plaintiff's case, therefore, rested upon an allegation that the property in suit was the property of an undivided Hindu family. Now with regard to Survey No. 535, there is evidence, which both the Courts have found to be conclusive, that Girdharlal was in exclusive possession from some date long prior to 1899, therefore, apparently Girdharlal was in enjoyment of it as his own separate property.

Then with regard to plots Nos. 545 and 544, there is evidence on the record that arbitration proceedings took place under a reference on the 27th September 1899, the parties being Girdharlal the husband of the first defendant, Amratlal Aditram his nephew on behalf of himself and as guardian of his minor brother Chhotlal, and Ruxmani as guardian of her minor son Manilal. Chhotlal is the present plaintiff. The reference was in these terms:—"We, the undersigned, pass an agreement in writing that we have appointed Pandya Ramchandra Parjaram of Dakore and Tarwadi Bhogilal Valavram of Thasra arbitrators to settle about the partition, moveable and immoveable property, debts and outstandings, lands, trees, etc., belonging to our brother and uncle Chhaganlal Sevakram who is dead and of the joint undivided lands." Chhaganlal was the brother of Girdharlal and the uncle of Amratlal and Chhotlal. Upon that reference an award was made from which it appears that Survey No. 445 and two Koss' share in the well in Survey No. 544 had belonged to Chhaganlal, and these were assigned to Girdharlal. The first defendant claims title both as widow of Girdharlal and as his devisee under his Will, and the second defendant claims title as assignee from her both as widow and devisee.

Upon the facts hitherto referred to, it appears to me clear that the conclusion of the lower Courts that the plaintiff had not established his title to the properties in suit as joint undivided Hindu property, was justified because Survey No. 535 was the separate property of Girdharlal, and Survey No. 545 and the rights in 544 belonged exclusively to Chhaganlal up to the time of his death, and the award shows that there was other property which was joint family property.

It is, however, contended, and this is practically the only contention now put forward, that there is evidence that there was a partition in the family between Chhotlal's father and Girdharlal and Chhaganlal which was recorded in a partition deed, and that the lands 535, 545 and 544 came to the persons who enjoyed them subsequent to 1885 by virtue of the provisions of that partition deed, and it is contended that no other evidence can be referred to as to the nature of the property, that is to say, whether it was separate or joint property under the partition deed, while the partition deed not having been registered cannot be looked at. It is urged that section 91 of the Indian Evidence Act prevents the Court from concluding that there was partition at any time which led to a separation in interest of members of this family, because it is known that there was a partition deed in 1885 which cannot be looked at. In my opinion that is an attempt to carry the provisions of section 91 too far. It provides that "when the terms of a contract, or of a grant, or of any other disposition of property, (within one of which categories the partition fell) have been reduced to the form of a document, and in all cases in which any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document (which is not the case with regard to transactions in the nature of partition), no evidence shall be given in proof of the terms of such contract, grant, or other disposition of property, or of such matter, except the document itself, or secondary evidence of its contents in cases in which secondary evidence is admissible."

Now we are not concerned with cases in which the matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document. Section 91, therefore, with regard to a disposition of property, such as we are now concerned with, prohibits any evidence of its terms other than the document itself, or secondary evidence of its contents where secondary evidence is admissible. It does not appear to me from the record of the proceedings before the Court that there has been any attempt to prove the terms of any partition deed or of any transaction of partition. All that the Court has been concerned with is to find out whether particular properties claimed by the plaintiff to the joint family property were at the date of suit joint or separate.

The argument on behalf of the appellant, which has been urged very earnestly, is that the relationship of separated Hindus must in the present case proceed from an act in the law taking the shape of a partition deed, and, therefore, that relationship cannot be proved by oral evidence. According to my reading, section 91 does not go to that length, and the English Law as indicated in Taylor on Evidence, upon which the Indian Evidence Act is known to have been largely founded, does not support the appellant's contention. In paragraph 405 of Taylor (10th edition) it is stated:—"The fact of the existence of a particular relationship may be shown by parol evidence, though the terms which govern such relationship appear to be in writing;" and again in the same paragraph: "the fact of partnership may be proved by parol evidence of the acts of the parties, without producing the deed." The leading authority in England for those propositions is the statement of Baron Alderson in Augustien v. Challis (1), who said that you prove by parol the relationship of landlord and tenant; but without the lease you cannot tell whether any rent was due. A decision to the same effect is to be found in Kedar Nath Joardar v. Shurfoonnissa Bibee (2). That the fact of partnership may be proved without the production of the deed of partnership was established in Alderson v. Clay (3). Cotterill v. Hobby (4) and Strother v. Barr (5) are good illustrations of the distinction between proof of relationship of landlord and tenant and proof of the terms of the tenancy. In my opinion, therefore, the evidence upon which the lower Court came to the conclusion that the properties in suit were the separate properties of the plaintiff's uncles was rightly admitted. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

BEAMAN, J.—Three brothers, Chhaganlal, Girdharlal and Aditram, admittedly constituted a joint Hindu family. The present suit is brought by the son of Aditram to recover certain properties set forth in the plaint alienated by Mahakore, the widow of Girdharlal, and the foundation of the claim is that the family was a joint Hindu family. It has been contended here that although it is virtually admitted that a partition was effected in the year 1885, and evidenced by a writing, inasmuch as that writing was not registered, neither can any proof of its terms be given, nor can the fact that the family from that time forward were separate be proved in any other way. If the fact is provable, it has been convincingly proved I think as shown by the Chief Justice aliunde. I wish, if possible, to avoid going over any of the grounds, covered by that judgment. The Chief Justice has stated with abundant authority a proposition, of the soundness of which I think there can be no doubt. I agree that under section 91 of the Indian Evidence Act, as contended by the appellant here, the Courts were precluded from seeking the terms of the partition in the document which was inadmissible for want of registration. I agree that that document could not be used in any way as affecting the property, the subject-matter of this suit. But having regard to the carefully drawn terms of section 91, it appears to me clear beyond all doubt that a fact which does not necessarily constitute a term, in any real sense, of a contract, grant, or other disposition of property, may be proved, although the writing in which the terms of that contract, grant, or disposition of property were embodied cannot be proved for want of registration. It follows, I think, that the plaintiff relying on union, and his claim necessarily depending upon the proof of that relationship, the fact of separation is not a term in any sense of the manner in which the parties distributed the property at the time the separation was made and was embodied in writing, and is, therefore, a fact de hors the document which can be proved independently. The two Courts below, as far as I can see, made no attempt to look at the terms of the document for the purposes of this suit. It is certain, I think, that separation in the sense of a change of legal relationship is in no sense a term necessary to be included in a partition deed. A separation ordinarily precedes the distribution of what was formerly joint property. Logically it must always precede it in time. But so far as the terms upon which parties who were formerly joint and have become separate agree thenceforward to distribute and enjoy the property, they are confined to that subject, and the terms have nothing to do with the statement of fact that a change in the relationship of individuals has taken place. For example, suppose that the parties here had never constituted a joint Hindu family at all, but had been merely tenants-in-common, every term in the partition deed might have been exactly the same, and the preliminary statement, if the deed indeed contained such a statement, that the family up to that time had been joint, and thenceforward ceased to be joint, would obviously be a fact standing alone, and not making up any part of the terms of the disposition of the property. I should have thought that this matter would hardly have admitted of any doubt, had it not been for the array of authority apparently bearing upon the point which the learned Pleader for the appellant was able to adduce. Much of that authority is, I think, easily distinguishable. The principle stated by the Chief Justice is the true principle, and is supported by authority of at least equal weight. I think it unnecessary to go more deeply into the question which has been exhaustively treated, and I should not have said this much, but that I wished to express my own emphatic opinion that the law laid down by the Chief Justice in the judgment just delivered is right and governs this case.

I concur in the order proposed.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 102, 108, 178—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 137—Contract—Negotiability—Delivery order, whether negotiable—Document of title—Test.

Negotiability can be attached to documents by mercantile usage. [p. 89, col. 2.]

A document is negotiable if by the custom of the money market it is transferable as if it were cash; and its bona fide transferee obtains a good title to it (because of its currency) although his transferor might have stolen it. [p. 92, col. 1.]

The test whether a document is a "document of title" or a "document showing title" to goods is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by endorsement or delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented. [p. 89, col. 2; p. 92, col. 1.]

A delivery order is a document of title to the goods to which it relates and the property of the transferor in the goods passes to the transferee by delivery of the document; but when once delivery has been made to the person entitled, the delivery order is exhausted and ceases to have any effect. [p. 93, col. 1.]

A delivery order may or may not be negotiable according to the conditions attached to it or according to the usage of trade under which it is issued. [p. 89, col. 2; p. 90, col. 1.]

Case-law discussed.

A document may be negotiable although it contains conditions, but when a seller of goods issues a document the real effect of which is that he will hand over certain goods to any one producing the document provided he has them and he has been paid his price and all charges in connection with them, no usage or custom of trade can compel him to hand the goods over if he has not the goods or has not been paid the price and stipulated charges. [p. 90, col. 2.]

A document showing title to goods represents the goods to which it relates and the law governing its transferability is the same as the law which governs the transferability of the goods themselves and is contained in sections 108 and 178 of the Contract Act. [p. 92, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

Fox, C. J.—Khoo Beng Ok was a Chinese merchant who had a rice mill on the Dalla side of the Rangoon river and his office in Rangoon.

KHOO EO KHWET v. NANIGRAM JAGANATH FIRM.

By two contracts in forms usual in the trade he sold 660 bags of boiled rice to S. P. S. Hoosain Nyna, a dealer in rice. According to the terms of the contracts delivery of the rice was to be taken ex-hopper into the buyer's gunny bags, but the bags could not be removed from the mill until the price of the rice in them and other charges (if any) in respect of it had been paid for.

Nyna took delivery of the rice ex-hopper and on the 7th February he paid for it by giving Khoo Beng Ok a Chetty's cheque on one of the European Banks. In exchange for this Khoo Beng Ok gave Nyna his receipted bills for the rice and an order to his godown keeper at the mill which is in the following terms:—

On the same day a durwan or messenger from Nyna went to the mill to take away the rice. He did not bring the delivery order but said that on his signature the delivery order could be obtained next day in Rangoon. Khoo Beng Ok's eldest son, who was at the time in charge of the mill, referred to his father in Rangoon by telephone, and was authorized by him to allow the rice to be removed by the durwan on his signing for it. The bags were loaded into cargo boat No. 914 and shipped on the same day on the S. S. Oxfordshire for Colombo. The Bought Note and the Bill of Lading represent S. S. A. S. Sochalingam Chetty, the man who had given the cheque in payment of the rice, as the shipper, and the consignee at Colombo was S. S. A. S. Palaniappa Chetty. It does not appear what rights this firm had over the rice, but having given a cheque for the price of it, and got the shipping documents for it made out in its name, the firm in all probability had the rights of at least a pledgee in respect of it.

There is no evidence as to how Khoo Beng Ok was induced to authorize removal of the rice from his mill without production of the delivery order. His evidence was not available in the case because he died shortly after the suit was filed.

He did not get back the delivery order next day or at all. There is no evidence as to his having made any attempt to get it back.

On the 21st February Nyna went to the plaintiff firm which lends money on the security of delivery orders, and told the plaintiff's son that he had to pay for rice on the following day. The terms of an advance were arranged, and next day Nyna came to the plaintiff's office with a durwan who had the delivery order and receipted bills given by Khoo Beng Ok to Nyna on the 17th February. Nyna said that this man was the mill-owner's durwan. The plaintiff's son gave Nyna a cheque on a Bank for Rs. 4,000 which Nyna endorsed and handed over to the durwan, to whom was also paid Rs. 1,584-10-0, and the durwan gave the delivery order and Khoo Beng Ok's receipted bills to the plaintiff's son. The latter believed that the durwan was the employee of the miller, and understood that the money and cheque were going to the miller.

Nothing happened in connection with the delivery order until early in the following May, when it became known that Nyna had absconded. The fraud committed by him in connection with the delivery order in suit was not the only one he committed. He apparently used forged delivery orders also, and is undergoing imprisonment on account of such offences. After presenting the delivery order in suit to Khoo Beng Ok and calling on him to deliver the rice mentioned in it, the plaintiff firm, on this being refused, filed their suit for Rs. 5,584-10-0, the price of the rice under the contracts with Nyna, and for Rs. 217-12, the cost of the gunny bags and twines supplied by Nyna. They also claimed interest. They based their claim on the ground that by the custom of the rice trade the delivery order which they held was a negotiable instrument entitling the bona fide holder of it for value to the delivery of the bags of rice mentioned in it. In 1890 the Recorder of Rangoon held in Vyravon Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mohr Bros., Ltd. (1) that a delivery order from the office of a rice-milling firm in Rangoon to one of its mills in the outskirts was neither (1) a document of title to the rice referred to in it, nor (2) a negotiable instrument. He also held that it had not been proved in the case that there was a trade custom prevalent in Rangoon by which holders of delivery orders for rice can claim the rice mentioned therein free from the vendor's lien for the price and the charges thereon.

The first of the above propositions was based on LeGeyt v. Harvey (2). From the recent decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (3), it seems to follow that what was decided in LeGeyt v. Harvey (2) is no longer good law.

The second proposition that delivery orders could not be negotiable instruments was based on Crouch v. Credit Foncier Co. (4). In that case Blackburn, J., one of the most eminent of commercial lawyers, laid down in effect that no instrument made in England could be a negotiable instrument unless it was so under the law merchant, or it had been made so by legislation. In Goodwin v. Roberts (5) in the Exchequer Chamber Cockburn, C. J., an equally eminent lawyer expressly dissented from this proposition and held that negotiability could be attached to documents by the usages of a trade. The following are extracts from his judgment:—

“While we quite agree that the greater or less time during which a custom has existed may be material in determining how far it has generally prevailed, we cannot think that if a usage is once shown to be universal, it is the less entitled to prevail because it may not have formed part of the law merchant as previously recognised and adopted by the Courts.”

* * * * *

“We cannot concur in thinking that if proof of general usage had been established, it would have been a sufficient ground for refusing to give effect to it that it did not form part of what is called ‘the ancient law merchant’.” It has been suggested by Mr. Willis in his work on Negotiable Securities, (1901) W. Willis’ Law of Negotiable Securities 37 that the above two decisions are reconcilable, and that the decision in Crouch v. Credit Foncier Co. (4) was still good law, but Kennedy, J., in Bechuanaland Exploration Company v. London Trading Bank (6) and Bigham, J., in Edelstein v. Schuler and Co. (7) held that the ruling of Blackburn, J., to which I have referred, had been overruled. In a note on page 275 of the 12th edition of Sir William Anson’s English Law of Contract it is said: “This extension of the range of negotiability by recent usage may perhaps need confirmation by Courts of Appeal.”

In Gilbertson & Co. v. Anderson and Coltman (8), Wills, J., refused to attach the attribute of negotiability to a delivery order by the vendor of goods on board a ship addressed to the master porter of a ship.

of the English Appeal Courts in England on the controverted ruling of Blackburn, J., this Court has to be guided by the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council, and it appears to me that in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (3) their Lordships’ decision involves the acceptance of the proposition that negotiability can be attached to documents by mercantile usage. In that case the main question was whether a railway receipt was a “document of title” or “a document showing title,” but the question of negotiability was also involved, and their Lordships held that by section 102 of the Contract Act the legislature intended to assimilate other documents of title to bills of lading for the purpose of determining the right of stoppage in transit in favour of a bona fide purchaser for value. As regards the question whether the railway receipt in question was a “document of title” or a document showing title, their Lordships remark:—

“In their Lordships’ opinion the only possible conclusion is that whenever any doubt arises as to whether a particular document is a ‘document showing title’ or a ‘document of title’ to goods for the purposes of the Indian Contract Act, the test is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise either by endorsement or delivery the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented.” They held that the railway receipt in question satisfied this test and that a pledgee who advanced money on the security of a railway receipt was entitled to the goods as against an unpaid vendor.

The effect of section 137 of the Transfer of Property Act is that in the case of the documents mentioned in the explanation to it, a transfer in writing and notice to the holder of goods is not necessary in order to constitute a valid transfer of goods mentioned in them. Amongst the documents mentioned in the explanation is an order for the delivery of goods. In Anglo Indian Jute Mills Co. v. Omademull (9), a delivery order from the agents of the Company in Calcutta to the Manager of one of its mills to deliver goods to a named firm or order was held to be a document of title, and the evidence establishing that delivery orders of the nature of the one in suit passed from hand to hand by endorsement and were sold and dealt with in the market, and that according to the invariable course of dealing in the Calcutta jute trade delivery orders were only issued on cash payment and were dealt with in the market as absolutely representing the goods to which they related free from any lien of the seller, the Mill Company were held liable to pay the plaintiffs the amount they had advanced on the delivery order, although a postdated cheque which the buyers had given in payment for the goods was dishonoured, and the Mill Company had never received payment. The company by issuing the delivery order lost its seller's lien on the goods in its possession.

(9) 10 Ind. Cas. 859; 38 C. 127.

KHOO EO KHWEET v. NANIGRAM JAGANATH FIRM.

The main ground of the decision was that the Company had represented that the delivery order would pass and confer a good title to the goods, and they had put it in the power of the buyers to endorse the delivery order with this representation to the plaintiffs who, dealing in good faith and for value, were induced to alter their position on the faith of the representation so made.

The form of delivery order in the present case differs considerably from the form in an order for delivery without any condition; in the present case the form expressly states that the order for delivery is subject to conditions, one of which appears on the front of the sheet of paper and the others on the back. Although it may be said that by it the miller undertakes to deliver the bags of rice mentioned in it to whoever produces it to the godown keeper, the document itself gives notice to any one asked to advance money on it that he may not be able to obtain the rice at all by means of it if the rice has been destroyed by fire, and that he will not obtain it if the price and all godown rent and other charges in respect of it have not been paid.

The conditions set out are sufficient to put a prudent man on enquiry as to whether the rice was still in existence and as to whether the price and all charges payable to the miller have been paid, when he is asked either to buy the rice or to advance money on the order.

With such conditions plainly stated in the order itself it is difficult to see how the miller can be held to have made a representation to every one into whose hands the documents might come bona fide that he would hand over the rice even if he had not been paid its price. The ratio decidendi in the Calcutta case does not appear to me to apply in the present case, because of the terms of the delivery order giving every one who reads them notice that the rice may not be in existence, and if in existence may not have been paid for, and that the seller retains his lien for everything due in respect of it. No doubt a document may be negotiable although it contains conditions: a bill of lading usually contains many conditions absolving the carrier from liability for not delivering the goods covered by it, but when a seller of goods issues a document the real effect of which is that he will hand over certain goods to any one producing the document provided he has them and that he has been paid his price and all charges in connection with them, can any usage or custom of trade compel him to hand the goods over if he has not the goods and has not been paid his price and his stipulated charges? I think not.

The above appears to me to be the effect of the delivery order which we have to deal with in the present case, and the right of any one claiming under it must, in my judgment, be determined by the terms of the document itself. Under proviso 5 to section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act a usage or custom by which incidents not expressly mentioned in a contract are usually annexed to contracts of that description may be proved, provided that the annexing of such incidents would not be repugnant to or inconsistent with the express terms of the contract. The usage sought to be applied to the delivery order in this case is that the miller who issues such a delivery order is bound to hand over the goods mentioned in it to any one who produces the document notwithstanding he has not been paid for them. Such a usage would, in my opinion, be repugnant to and inconsistent with the express terms of the document under which the seller expressly has a lien on the rice mentioned in the delivery order until it has been paid for and until all godown rent and other charges have been paid.

How then can such delivery orders be said to have become negotiable instruments by virtue of a custom or usage in the trade when the custom or usage in the trade cannot be proved?

In my judgment Khoo Beng Ok was not liable to the plaintiff and his representatives are not. So far as it goes, no doubt the evidence shows that delivery orders by mill owners to their mill managers are used to obtain advances on in Rangoon, but I should require better and more cogent evidence than was produced in this case before being satisfied that the general body of mill owners in Rangoon regard their obligations in respect of delivery orders issued by them to their mill managers in the same light as the witnesses for the plaintiff in this case. It would be surprising if mill owners had given up the distinctly advantageous position in which the decision in Vyrvon Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mohr Bros. Ltd. (1) placed them.

If money-lenders choose to advance money without reading and having regard to the terms of the documents on which they are asked to advance, they do so at their own risk.

Khoo Beng Ok fulfilled the contract in respect to which he gave the delivery order. The order itself contains no guarantee or undertaking that he would hold the goods and not deliver to any one except some one who produced the order.

The terms of this order put every one asked to advance money on it on enquiry as to whether the goods exist, and whether the mill owner will deliver them without payment. I am unable to hold that by issuing such a document Khoo Beng Ok estopped himself from denying that he had delivered the goods to the person with whom he had contracted, or to hold that he and his representatives are liable to the plaintiff on the ground of estoppel.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Original Court, and dismiss the suit, ordering the plaintiff to pay the defendants' costs of the suit and of this appeal, allowing the defendants extra costs of 10 gold mohurs a day for three days in the Original Court.

ORMOND, J.—The respondents are the legal representatives of Khoo Beng Ok (deceased), who owned a rice mill and sold under two contracts 660 bags of boiled rice to Nyna, a dealer in rice. On 17th February Nyna paid for the rice and the miller gave him receipted bills and a delivery order on his godown-keeper (Exhibit A). The document is expressed to be subject to the terms of the two contracts and directed delivery to be given to Nyna or bearer. The goods were ascertained and were the property of Nyna in the custody of the miller. Later, on the same day Nyna obtained delivery of the goods without giving up the delivery order, saying that it was in Rangoon and that he would return it the next day. Nyna at that time was in possession of the delivery order. On the 22nd February Nyna fraudulently obtained from the plaintiff Rs. 5,584-10-0 on the pledge of the two receipted bills and the delivery order; and in May he disappeared. The plaintiff then sued the miller to recover this amount which was also the value of the goods covered by the delivery order. The plaintiff obtained a decree and the defendant now appeals.

The evidence shows that Exhibit A, which is in a form well known in the trade, is transferable by delivery; that it is not issued until the goods have been paid for; that receipted bills showing such payment are attached to the delivery order and the documents are passed on; that Banks will advance money on the delivery order when they are satisfied that the goods have been paid for; and that delivery is given upon production of the document.

In the case of Vyrvon Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mohr Bros. Ltd. (1) (which was decided by the Recorder of Rangoon in 1890) the transferee of delivery orders, similar to Exhibit A, sued the miller. He obtained a decree on the delivery order, the goods for which had been paid for; but this claim on the delivery orders, the goods for which had not been paid for, was dismissed on the ground that the delivery orders were not negotiable instruments and that the vendor had not lost his lien. It was also held in that case that the delivery orders were not documents of title—following the English decisions—but a decree was given to the plaintiff against the miller in respect of the rice which had been paid for, on the ground that the miller could not have refused to deliver to his buyer and that, therefore, he could not refuse to deliver to the holder of the delivery order.

The test whether a document is a document of title or merely a token of authority to receive possession, is laid down by the Privy Council in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (3), where it is said: "The test is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising, or purporting to authorise, either by endorsement or delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented." Upon the evidence this delivery order must be taken to be a document showing title to goods. The delivery order expressly states that it is subject to the terms of the contract and that the goods are not to be removed before payment. It thus preserves the vendor's lien for the price of the goods (if not already paid for) and it shows that the person who acquires the property in the goods is subject to any liability which attaches to the original buyer under the contract.

The learned Judge has held that this delivery order is not only a document of title to goods, but that it is also a "negotiable instrument", and that the plaintiff as the "holder", therefore, was entitled to recover as against the defendant; and he also held that the defendant was estopped from saying that the delivery order was exhausted by reason of delivery having been given to the buyer.

The learned Judge has, I think, overlooked the fact that in all the cases where a document has been held to be a "negotiable instrument" an essential element of the decision was that by the custom of the money market, the document was transferable as if it were cash. A bona fide transferee of cash obtained a good title to the cash (because of its currency) although his transferor might have stolen it. The document in such a case, therefore, had the element of 'negotiability' properly so called; a bona fide transferee for value of the document acquired a good title even though his transferor had none. Upon this principle certain securities for money (such as bonds and scrip) have been held to be negotiable instruments, although they would not be covered by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

But a document showing title to goods is on a different footing: the document is taken to represent the goods to which it relates and the law governing its transferability is the same as the law which governs the transferability of the goods themselves. And this law, apart from any question of estoppel, is to be found in sections 108 and 178 of the Contract Act.

In Scrutton on Charter Parties at page 155, Note 1, it is said: "'Negotiable' is a term which perhaps strictly should be reserved for instruments which may give to a transferee a better title than that possessed by the transferor. A bill of lading is not 'negotiable' in this sense; the endorsee does not get a better title than his assignor. A bill of lading is 'negotiable' to the same extent as a cheque marked 'not negotiable', i. e., it is 'not transferable'." Blackburn, J., in Cole v. North Western Bank (10) says: "The possession of bills of lading or other documents of title to goods did not at common law confer on the holder of them any greater power than the possession of the goods themselves. The transfer of a bill of lading for goods in transitu had the same effect in defeating the unpaid vendor's right to stop in transitu that an actual delivery of the goods themselves under the same circumstances would have had. But the transfer of the document of title by means of which actual possession of the goods could be obtained, had no greater effect at common law than the transfer of the actual possession." And Lord Campbell, C. J., in Gurney v. Behrend (11) says: "A bill of lading is not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer. Although the shipper may have endorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his right is not affected by an appropriation of it without his authority. If it be stolen from him or transferred without his authority, a subsequent bona fide transferee for value cannot make title under it as against the shipper of the goods. The Bill of Lading only represents the goods, and in this instance the transfer of the symbol does not operate more than a transfer of what is represented."

The delivery order is a document of title to the goods to which it relates and the property of the transferor in the goods passes to the transferee by delivery of the document. This delivery order purported to be a document of title to certain specific goods belonging to Nyna in the custody of the defendant which were deliverable under certain contracts. But when the plaintiff acquired this title, the goods had ceased to exist and there was no title in Nyna; the plaintiff, therefore, acquired no title to any goods. No doubt the defendant, by giving delivery to Nyna without the production of the delivery order, did so at his own risk; and if Nyna had pledged the delivery order with the plaintiff before he received delivery, the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff for having wrongfully disposed of the plaintiff's property. But Nyna was then in possession of the delivery order and was the person entitled to delivery.

When once delivery has been given to the person entitled, the delivery order is exhausted. Channell, J., in London Joint Stock Bank v. British Amsterdam Maritime Agency (12) says: "If Messrs. Palmers were the persons entitled at that time to have the goods delivered to them, then it seems to me that the bill of lading would be exhausted." See also Scrutton on Charter Parties, pages 183 and 273. Delivery having been given to the person entitled the delivery order ceased to have any effect.

Sections 178 and 108, Exception 1, of the Contract Act do not help the plaintiff: because there were no goods and the delivery order having become exhausted, there was no delivery order. Moreover, Nyna was not, and never had been, in possession of the document by the consent of the owner (defendant); for Nyna was himself the owner of the delivery order until he took delivery and after delivery, though the defendant was entitled to have the document given up to him, it was not by his consent that Nyna retained it.

As to estoppel, if A issues a mercantile document to which, by the custom of the trade, certain incidents are attached, he is estopped from denying that he is bound by those incidents, unless there is something in the document to show the contrary. Thus the maker of a delivery order which by the custom of the trade relates to goods which have been paid for, is estopped from saying that they have not been paid for and he loses his lien: Merchant Banking Company of London v. Phoenix Bessemer Steel Company (13).

In Goodwin v. Roberts (5), followed by Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank (14), it was decided that upon the ground of estoppel a person who deposits with an agent a security on the face of it payable to bearer, cannot recover it from a bona fide holder for value to whom the agent had fraudulently transferred it, whether it be a negotiable instrument, recognized by law as such, or not: because he had made a representation on the face of the scrip that it would pass with a good title to anyone who took it in good faith and for value. But as pointed out by Lord Selborne in France v. Clark (15) and by Lord Esher in Fine Art Society v. Union Bank (16), the fact that the document in that case was treated as a 'negotiable instrument' by the mercantile world was essential to the decision. And Lord Bramwell in Colonial Bank v. Cady (17) says: "I cannot, with all respect to Lord Cairns, see any ground for applying the doctrine of Pickard v. Sears (18) in Goodwin v. Roberts (5). The plaintiff there was not making a claim inconsistent with anything he had theretofore said or done." It clearly could not have been intended to decide that the maker of every document which is transferable by delivery, is estopped from denying that it is a "negotiable instrument", when it is not a negotiable instrument either at law or by custom.

In the present case there was no implied representation by the defendant that he would deliver the goods to anyone who was a bona fide transferee for value of the document: but merely that he would deliver the goods to anyone who had a good title to the delivery order, and that an endorsement of the delivery order was not necessary in order to pass the title. If the bailee had notice that the person presenting the delivery order was not entitled to the delivery order, and he gave him delivery, he would do so at his own risk.

Lastly it is urged that the defendant is estopped by his negligence in not taking back the delivery order; and that by his omission to do so, he enabled Nyna to perpetrate the fraud on the plaintiff. There is no question as to the bona fides of the defendant. No duty was cast on the defendant to recover the document. Nyna was not the defendant's agent, and the defendant was not responsible for him. So far from there being any negligence on the part of the defendant, he could not possibly have recovered the document if Nyna did not intend to give it up. Nothing on the part of the defendant but actual notice to the plaintiff could have prevented Nyna from perpetrating this fraud on the plaintiff. Though the defendant might have foreseen the possibility of Nyna making a fraudulent use of the document, he could not foretell who the victim might be; and consequently he could not give notice to the plaintiff. The omission by the defendant was not the proximate cause of the loss; but rather the plaintiff's omission in not making enquiries from the defendant and satisfying himself that the document was a genuine delivery order and that the goods were in existence.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the decree and dismiss the suit with costs to the defendant in both Courts. On the original side the plaintiff was given extra costs of 10 gold mohurs a day for three days—the defendant should have these extra costs.

Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), s. 36—Court, power of—Examination—Application, contents of—Order refusing application, grounds of.

That litigation may ultimately ensue between the Official Assignee and the party to be examined under section 36 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is no ground for refusing an order for examination under that section. [p. 95, col. 1.]

When the Official Assignee applies for the examination of a person under section 36 of the Act, he should state shortly the nature of the information likely to be given by the person sought to be examined and the dealings or properties of the insolvent to which such information will relate. [p. 95, col. 1.]

An order for the examination of a person under section 36 should not be made upon the allegation in the Official Assignee's petition that the person sought to be examined appears capable of giving information respecting the insolvent's dealings and properties. [p. 95, col. 1.]

The powers of the Court are very wide under section 36 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act and no limit has been fixed by the section during which the powers may be exercised. Although the Court would in using these powers be careful to see that they are not used unduly and unnecessarily after a considerable time has elapsed from the time of the discharge of the insolvent, still there is nothing in the Act to limit the exercise of the powers to the period before the discharge. [p. 95, col. 2.]

Mr. Langford James, for the Applicant.

Mr. N. N. Sircar (with him Mr. B. K. Ghosh), for the Official Assignee.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application by Sreemutty Binodini Dassee to set aside an order of the Registrar in Insolvency, dated the 6th June 1916, for her examination under section 36 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. The order was obtained upon the application of the Official Assignee and the applicant seeks to set aside the order on three grounds: (i) that the insolvent having obtained his discharge no order under section 36 can now be made; (ii) that the application on which the order was made disclosed no grounds for making such order; (iii) that as litigation may ensue between the applicant and the Official Assignee, an order for her examination would be inequitable.

I deal with the third ground first; and with regard to this ground I hold that the case is upon the facts eminently one for the examination of the applicant under section 36, if such an examination can now be ordered, and I see no ground for refusing an order under section 36 because litigation may ultimately ensue between the Official Assignee and the party to be examined; if this were so, it would in many cases render the valuable provisions of section 36 nugatory. The case seems to me quite different when there is actual litigation in progress between the Official Assignee and the person sought to be examined.

With regard to the second ground, it appears from the petition of the Official Assignee that the order was made upon his allegation that the applicant appeared capable of giving information respecting the insolvent's dealings and properties. I should not myself have made an order upon an application of this kind. I think the Official Assignee should state shortly the nature of the information likely to be given by the person sought to be examined, and the dealings or properties of the insolvent to which such information will relate. But I have before me ample materials to justify the making of the order, if it can be made at this stage, and accordingly I do not propose to set aside the order upon this ground.

It now remains to consider the first and most important ground upon which the order is sought to be set aside.

Section 36 provides that the Court may, on the application of the Official Assignee, or of any creditor who has proved his debt at any time after an order of adjudication has been made, summons before it the insolvent or any person known or suspected to have in his possession any property belonging to the insolvent, or supposed to be indebted to the insolvent or any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information respecting the insolvent, his dealings or property.

The section fixes no limit during which the powers under it may be exercised, but it was urged before me, on behalf of the applicant, that the powers cease on the insolvent's discharge, because section 43 of the Act provides what is to be done by a discharged insolvent to assist in the realization of his property and, it is said, that section would not have been necessary if the provisions of sections 33—37 were still subsisting after the insolvency. It may be that so far as the insolvent is concerned, the provisions of section 36 are not applicable after his discharge, having regard to the provisions of section 43, but I see no reason why this should be so in the case of the other persons referred to in section 36. To so hold would, I think, be prejudicial to the insolvent himself, as it might delay his obtaining his discharge, as, if the Court's powers under section 36 came to an end upon the same being granted, the Court might hesitate to grant such discharge at as early a period as, but for this, it would otherwise do. The powers of the Court are very wide under section 36, and I think the Court would, in using them, be careful to see they were not used unduly and unnecessarily after a considerable time had elapsed from the time of the discharge, but I see nothing in the Act to limit the powers of the Court under section 36 to the period before discharge, and accordingly I think, in a proper case, the Court can even after discharge use the powers given by section 36. I think the present is a proper case upon the materials before me, and accordingly the first ground of the application also fails and the application must be dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

Succession Certificate Act (VII of 1889), s. 6—Assignee of representative of deceased, whether can apply.

A succession certificate may be granted to the assignee of the representative of a deceased person.

Appeal from an order of the District Judge, Muzafferpur, dated the 9th February 1915.

Mr. Muhammad Mustafa Khan, for the Appellant.

Rai Gurusaran Prasad, for the Respondent.
JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—This is an appeal against an order granting a succession certificate. The appellant is Ramchariter Sahu, his brother was one Ramdhari. Ramdhari died leaving a son Bhagwat. It is the debt due to Ramdhari's son Bhagwat (who is dead) which formed the subject of the certificate. The order was made ex parte, the appellant not having appeared at the hearing. There was evidence that the brothers Ramchariter and Ramdhari had separated. This evidence is also supported by the judicial proceedings which admittedly took place. That being so, it is difficult to say that the appellant has any locus standi to prosecute this appeal. The family being separate the infant son Bhagwat was succeeded by his mother and until the death of his mother Ramchariter has no interest in the estate.

The point taken in appeal is that the succession certificate should not have been granted in this case. It appears that after the death of Bhagwat his mother who succeeded him assigned her rights and the various debts including this one to Ram Narain Sahu, to whom the succession certificate has been granted. It has been argued that a succession certificate cannot be granted to the assignee of the representative of a deceased person. I see no reason why a succession certificate should not have been granted to the assignee. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

ROE, J.—I agree.

Where in a suit under section 111A of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the plaintiff tenant asks not only for a declaration of the occupancy right of which he claims he is in possession, but also asks for a declaration that the entry in the Record of Rights as to his status as tenure-holders is a nullity, the plaint comes within section 7, sub-section 4, clause (c), of the Court Fees Act, inasmuch as a consequential relief is asked therein. [p. 97, col. 1.]

The proviso to section 111A of the Bengal Tenancy Act must be strictly applied. [p. 97, col. 1.]

The provision of rule 11, Order VII, Code of Civil Procedure, is mandatory, so that a Court has no alternative but to reject a plaint written upon an insufficiently stamped paper, when the plaintiff on being required by the Court to supply the requisite stamp paper within the time fixed by the Court fails to do so. JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—I think this appeal must be dismissed.

The point arises upon the plaint which was filed in this case. The learned Judge has held that the plaint was not one that merely asked for a declaratory decree, but was one in which a consequential relief was claimed. The stamp which was upon the plaint was one of Rs. 10, the stamp which is applicable to a plaint in a suit to obtain a declaratory decree, under Article 17, clause (iii), of the Second Schedule to the Court Fees Act of 1870. The learned Judge held that it was a plaint in which a consequential relief was asked, and consequently it came within section 7, sub-section 4, clause (c) of that Act.

In my judgment there is no doubt that the learned Judge was right. The suit was instituted under section 111A of the Bengal Tenancy Act; and in considering the nature of the suit regard must be had to the actual words of the section. It provides that "No suit shall be brought in any Civil Court in respect of any order directing the preparation of a Record of Rights under this chapter . . .", with certain saving clauses, 'Provided that any person who is dissatisfied with any entry in, or omission from, a Record of Rights framed in pursuance of an order made under section 101, sub-section (2), clause (d), which concerns a right of which he is in possession, may institute a suit for declaration of his right under Chapter VI of the Specific Relief Act, 1877." In my judgment these words must be strictly applied. What is it he is entitled to ask for in a suit brought under that section? He is entitled to ask for a declaration of the right of which he claims he is in possession. In this case the plaintiff claims that he is in possession of an occupancy right. Therefore, he is quite entitled to ask for such a declaration as is comprised in clause (a) of paragraph 11 of his plaint. But he goes on in paragraph (b) to ask for a declaration that "the entry in the records as to his status as tenure-holder is a nullity." In my judgment that is not such a declaration as is contemplated by the proviso to section 111A. I think the words are so plain that the point which has been taken on behalf of the plaintiff is not really arguable. Therefore, I think the order of the learned Judge was right. Having come to the conclusion, as he did, that the plaintiff was asking for something more than a mere declaratory decree, and was asking for a consequential relief, what was the learned Judge to do? That is pointed out clearly by Order VII, rule 11, which says this:—"The plaint shall be rejected in the following cases: (a) where it does not disclose a cause of action", that is not the case here: (b) "where the relief claimed is undervalued, and the plaintiff, on being required by the Court to correct the valuation within a time to be fixed by the Court, fails to do so", again that is not this case: "(c) where the relief claimed is properly valued, but the plaint is written upon paper insufficiently stamped, and the plaintiff, on being required by the Court to supply the requisite stamp paper within a time to be fixed by the Court, fails to do so." In this case the relief was properly valued at Rs. 5,225, at least there was nothing said to show that the relief was not properly valued. But the learned Judge rightly came to the conclusion that the plaint was written upon paper insufficiently stamped and the plaintiff on being required by the Court to supply the requisite stamp paper within the time fixed by the Court failed to do so. Therefore, he had no other alternative but to reject the plaint in accordance with the terms of the rule. In my judgment, the learned Judge was right in his decision, he had no alternative but to reject the plaint.

The learned Counsel, who appeared on behalf of the plaintiff, asked this Court to give the plaintiff leave to amend his plaint by striking out paragraph (b) of clause 11 in his plaint. In my judgment, he ought not to be allowed to do so for the reasons I have already given, and, this Court has no more power than the learned Judge when it is shown that the case comes within Order VII, rule 11. This Court has no jurisdiction, the provision is mandatory, and this Court, just the same as the Court below, is bound by that section which provides that under the above-mentioned circumstances the suit shall be rejected.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.—The subject-matter of this appeal is described in the plaint as a shop, the occupant of which carries on grocery business. It is situate within Mahal Radhe Lal in Mauza Barampur, Pargana Manghaur, Tahsil Roorkee. The plaintiffs are zemindars of the mahal, this is admitted. It is said in the plaint that the defendant Hori Ram occupied a certain plot of land in the abadi as a tenant of the zemindars and paid chaukidara tax for the same. But subsequently under a collusive and fictitious sale-deed dated the 30th of May 1912, he sold the aforesaid shop to defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and he gave up residing in the village and took up his residence in Qasba Parkazi, District Muzaffarnagar. That the defendants-vendees took possession of the shop and are now in possession of it. That the defendant No. 1 occupied the land covered by the said shop as a ryot. He had legally no right to transfer nor had defendants-vendees any right to remain in possession thereof without the permission and consent of the plaintiffs, who are zemindars and proprietors. That immediately on coming to know of the sale, the plaintiffs desired the defendants-vendees several times to remove the materials purchased, to vacate the site and to make over possession thereof to the plaintiffs but they refused to do so. The plaintiffs accordingly pray that defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 be ordered to vacate the site of the shop and may be ordered to remove the materials of the shop purchased and absolute possession be given to the plaintiffs.

The answer to the allegations contained in the plaint are that defendant No. 1 was the owner of the property in suit and had been in proprietary and adverse possession for more than twelve years. He was not a tenant of the plaintiffs, nor did he pay the chaukidara or any zemindari dues. That the defendants have never been in possession within twelve years.

The case is not complicated by any contention that the mahal is not a purely agricultural mahal, and the dispute between the parties resolves itself into one of a zemindar seeking to eject from abadi lands persons who without right or permission derived from him occupied portions of the abadi land. The Court of first instance decreed the claim and the defendants went in appeal. The appeal was heard by the Additional District Judge of Saharanpur.

I have noticed in more than one case which has come from this Court that the Judge takes a peculiar view of the law on this subject. He starts off in the present case before me, as in other cases, in laying down that in the suit for possession it is the duty of the plaintiff to prove his possession within twelve years next before the institution of the suit. He appears entirely to forget the relation which exists between zemindar and tenant with regard to land situate in the abadi. It would appear that he had never really studied the leading case on this matter of Sri Girdhariji Maharaj v. Chote Lal (1). I say this, because if he had he would not have started with the inaccurate premise with which he does. In Second Appeal No. 1040 of 1914, I have pointed out the fallacy of this reasoning and called particular attention to it. If a person occupying a portion of the abadi in a purely agricultural mahal raises the defence of adverse possession, the burden of proving that possession lies very heavily upon him and he cannot rid himself of that burden by saying that the zemindar has not shown that he has been in possession within twelve years next preceding the suit. It is most natural that the plaintiffs should not know on what terms this land was given to the father of Umrao; if they had pretended to have such knowledge the probability would be that they would be setting up a fictitious case. It is enough to say, I am zemindar of this abadi and it is for you (the ryot)

to shew how contrary to the general custom prevalent in the United Provinces, you prove the plea of adverse possession. I do not mean to say there are not villages in which the Record of Rights does not admit the existence of some custom upon which such a plea might be founded, but I do say that the defendant has to bring forward an opposite custom and to prove that it is a custom prevailing in his village. The learned District Judge writes: "On the other hand, the defendants are purchasers from Umrao, who had been in adverse possession of the site of the shop for more than twelve years." He gives no foundation for the determination of this, but bases it upon what he is pleased to term a "series of rulings beginning with Nazir Hasan v. Shibba (2)." He has not said where this initial ruling of the series is to be found or where any other rulings of the series are to be met with. No attempt was made to support this judgment by a reference to any of these rulings. Only one case was cited to me with which I shall shortly deal. He goes on to say that "The ruling applicable to this case is Bhadder v. Khair-ud-din Husain (3)." That was in many ways a peculiar case. The houses in dispute were houses situate in Mohalla Daraganj in the city of Allahabad. The judgment does not show to what profession the person who laid claim to the houses as owner belonged. But it is said in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice "that neither the owner of it nor any of his predecessors-in-title ever paid any rent for it, nor gave any acknowledgment of his title to the zemindar, nor carried on any trade, such as that of carpenter, blacksmith, etc., for the carrying on of which sites in the abadi of a village are usually granted by the zemindar free of rent." Mohalla Daraganj cannot by any pretence be said to be a purely agricultural mohalla, it is a portion of the city of Allahabad inhabited mainly by pragwals and it is doubtful whether a single tenant of an agricultural type resides within the four corners of the mohalla. The claimant in the present case and his predecessor were apparently petty banias dealing in groceries and wares which would find favour in a purely agricultural village and would in most cases be necessary to make the village the self-consisting unit which Indian villages used to be.

The case referred to above is that of Rai Raj Narain v. Kammunu, First Appeal No. 1176 of 1915, decided on the 10th April 1917. The main point on which that case was decided was the contention of the plaintiff that the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court had disposed of the appeal on a ground which was not taken in the case and had set up a plea of adverse possession. There was, moreover, a finding that a custom of transfer of houses by tenants without any objection made by the zemindar was current and proved. This is a totally different case from the one before me. In this case the learned Judge goes on after these preliminary statements to lay down this startling result. That there being no proof that Umrao or his father was a ryot of the plaintiff, their possession must be presumed to be prima facie adverse. I allowed time in this present case at the special request of the learned Counsel for the respondents to allow the parties to arrive at some understanding, and I think it is unfortunate that the respondents do not appear to have availed themselves of this opportunity. The pleas taken in appeal prevail.

The appeal is decreed, the order of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and the decree of the Court of first instance is restored with costs in all Courts.

HASISWARI DEBI—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT
versus

HARI NATH CHAKERVERTY—

DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Landlord and tenant—Permanent tenure—Registered lease, necessity of.

A permanent tenure cannot be created under the Bengal Tenancy Act or any other Act except by a registered instrument, even where the land is agricultural land situate outside a town and let out for the purpose of growing thatching grass. [p. 101, col. 1.]

Therefore, a person who enters upon land as a tenant, cannot set up a permanent tenure unless his lease is registered in accordance with law. [p. 101, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Jessore, dated the 15th July 1915, reversing that of the Munsif, Narail, dated the 9th March 1914.

FACTS of the case will appear from the following extract from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court:—

"The suit out of which this appeal arises is one for a declaration of the plaintiff's title to an eight-anna share of the land in suit and for recovery of possession thereof. The land in suit. . . . was the property of Guru Prosad and his brother Durga Prosad, who owned it in equal shares. On Guru Prosad's death his eight-anna share of the land passed to his daughter Manorama, and on Durga Prosad's death his eight-anna share passed to his son Dwarka Nath. Dwarka Nath sold his eight-anna share to Durga Charan Chakravarty, and that share passed on Durga Charan's death to his sons Hari Nath and Jagabandhu, defendants in this suit, who are admittedly in possession thereof. The other eight-anna share which was inherited by Manorama from her father Guru Prosad is the subject-matter of this suit.

The plaintiff's case is that in consideration of the plaintiff Hasiswari having given her daughter in marriage to one Joygopal, so that there might be a palti marriage without payment of bride's price between Joygopal's sister and the said Manorama's son Kedar, Manorama granted a kaimi mourasi patta, dated the 9th Baisakh 1282 B. S., for some lands including the eight-anna share in the land in suit, reserving a yearly rent of Re. 1 to the plaintiff, that the patta was not registered on account of Manorama having died shortly after the grant of the patta, but the plaintiff remained in possession under the patta Manorama's son did not realize from her the rent reserved by the lease, and that the defendants wrongfully dispossessed her of her said eight-anna share of the land. . . . Defendant No. 1 denies the grant of a patta by Manorama Devi to the plaintiff or the acquisition by the plaintiff of any right under any patta granted to her by Manorama or otherwise. . . ."

Babu Hamendra Chandra Sen, for the Appellant.—The lower Appellate Court has found that because the patta on which the plaintiff's title rests was not registered in conformity with the provisions of law, the plaintiff has failed to prove her tenancy. I submit that even if the patta is not admissible in evidence to prove the tenancy in question, yet under the Bengal Tenancy Act which is applicable to this case a tenant can prove his tenancy right irrespective of any lease which he holds. The plaintiff can prove her tenancy by oral evidence although she cannot prove the lease for want of registration.

My next submission is that even if the plaintiff fails to establish her tenancy right she can show that she has acquired title by adverse possession for more than 12 years. The lower Appellate Court has found that by being admitted to occupation as a tenant the possession of the plaintiff is permissive possession, and, therefore, she is not entitled to prove adverse possession. I submit that the tenant (plaintiff) is entitled in such a case to prove adverse possession. There are authorities showing that if a plaintiff fails to prove his title by tenancy he can prove his title by adverse possession. See Uma Churn Ghose v. Bishwa Nath Ghose (1), Nisa Chand Gaita v. Kanchiram Bagani (2), Sundari Dassee v. Mudhoo Chunder Sircar (3). The above cases fully support my contention.

Babu Hiralall Chakerbutty, for the Respondent, was not called upon.

FLETCHER, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The first point that has been made is that, though this document which created the permanent tenure required registration under the provisions of the Indian Registration Act, yet, because the land was a land situated outside the town and let out for the purpose of growing thatching grass, therefore, the interest of the plaintiff that was a permanent interest could have been created without a registered document. I do not agree with that view. This is not a raiya holding, nor is it one in which the plaintiff could have acquired a right of occupancy. It is merely a permanent tenure of this small piece of land, and one cannot get a permanent tenure under the Bengal Tenancy Act or under any other Act except by a registered document. The learned Vakil who has argued the appeal on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant thinks that whenever the land is an agricultural land one can get a permanent tenure without a registered document. It is quite true that one can get an interest as a raiya by way of occupancy.

The other point as to the case of adverse possession has got no foundation at all. The plaintiff's case is that she entered upon the property as a tenant. She has not been able to prove that she was a permanent tenant, because the law requires that in such a case the lease should be registered. She says that her case is that at the time she entered into possession as tenant her possession became adverse. Obviously, that is not so. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

NEWBOULD, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.

STUART, A. J. C.—The six plaintiffs in the suit against the dismissal of which the present appeal has been brought are members of an association known as the Dargah Warsi Association.

They instituted a suit under section 92, Civil Procedure Code, in the Court of the District Judge of Lucknow, after having obtained the consent in writing of the Legal Remembrancer of the United Provinces, who is the Advocate-General within the meaning of the section, in which they prayed that certain moveable property appertaining to the mausoleum at Dewa, in the Bara Banki District, of Haji Waris Ali Shah, a mosque, a khanqah and an enclosure containing the tomb of Kurban Ali Shah, father of Haji Waris Ali Shah, should be vested in their Association, that the eight persons mentioned as defendants should be removed from the management of the properties and ordered not to interfere with the trust or with the offerings made at the mausoleum and the tomb, and that the Court should prepare a scheme of management for the properties. The learned District Judge dismissed the suit. The present appeal is preferred.

The history of the case is as follows:—Haji Waris Ali Shah was a Sunni Muhammadan by religion. He was born about 1817 or 1813. In 1820 his father Kurban Ali Shah died. There is no reliable evidence to show that Kurban Ali Shah had embraced a religious life or was other than a religious Muhammadan who pursued a secular calling. It is admitted on all sides that at a very early age Haji Waris Ali Shah showed an extraordinary inclination for a religious life and that even in his extreme boyhood he was regarded as amazingly proficient in his knowledge and practice of religion. He attached himself when he was a small boy to Haji Khadim Ali Shah, a Sufi Durwesh of Golaganj, Lucknow. Khadim Ali Shah died about 1832 or 1833 when Haji Waris Ali Shah was 16 years old. On the death of Khadim Ali Shah, Haji Waris Ali Shah started extensive travels in the course of which he visited Mecca on many occasions and is said to have gone through the greater part of Arabia, Persia, Turkey and other foreign countries. From 1845 and onwards he resided mainly in India. He wandered from place to place teaching his special doctrines until towards the end of his long life he settled in Dewa in the Bara Banki District and resided permanently there. He died in 1905 at the advanced age of 85 years. There has been considerable argument as to the nature of his teaching and as to the constitution of his sect. It is admitted that he remained in most matters of ceremonial an orthodox Muhammadan, and that at no time did he ever depart from the recognised tenets of the Sunni faith. But his mind was the mind of a mystic and the doctrines which he taught were transcendental and esoteric. Further his teaching had one marked peculiarity. It made no distinction between members of different faiths. He preached to and accepted as suitable recipients for his teaching Muhammadans, Hindus, and Christians alike, and it is clear that he did not make as a condition of participating in the benefit of his doctrines a change of faith from those who were not Muhammadans. It is not easy to ascertain exactly what his teaching was: and, although among the witnesses who are his declared disciples and who based the whole of their conduct upon the precepts which Haji Waris Ali Shah (whom they call and whom I shall call in future the Saint) laid down, there are many gentlemen of high intellectual attainments, not one has been able to give in the witness-box anything like a compendium of the principles taught by the Saint upon which their lives are based. This is not surprising in the circumstances. It is difficult anywhere except in a religious treatise to explain succinctly the tenets of any faith, and when that faith is esoteric and mystical the difficulties are greatly increased. This much is clear: the Saint taught as a fundamental principle the power of Divine Love. This Divine Love was of the purest and holiest type. It linked God to man and one man to another irrespective of the religious beliefs on other points of the human recipients. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Sharfuddin, one of the plaintiffs in this case, has stated in evidence that the Saint taught that the real religion was Love in which sinners and the virtuous, the rich and the poor, were all equal. The Saint once stated: "Whoever of mine here loves me is mine, be he a chamar or a sweeper." Although in his own life the Saint was celibate and pure, although he dressed in the meanest apparel and never permitted himself even the luxury of a bed, although he ate sparingly and abstemiously, and subsisted entirely on offerings made to him, never owning any sort of property, he was considerate to all, and did not demand from his followers the sacrifices that he made himself. To quote Mr. Justice Sharfuddin again: he treated all alike, the sinners and the people who call themselves virtuous. The sinners excited more pity in him as he preached Love in its spiritual sense, and he was the more anxious to redeem such sinners, even taking repentant prostitutes of advanced age as his disciples.

I have stated this much as to the Saint's history, life, and teaching in order to make clear the main point of controversy. The plaintiffs contend on one hand that the Saint's teaching was unique and essentially different from the teaching of any other religious teacher who had gone before. The defendants, while maintaining the Saint's position as that of an inspired holy man, do not admit that there was anything unique about his doctrines. They assert that the Saint was the disciple (or murid) of a Sufi named Haji Khadim Ali Shah, that he joined the Sufi college of Durweshes of which Haji Khadim Ali Shah was the head, that he succeeded Khadim Ali Shah as his sajjadanashin, and that he remained during his lifetime head of his college of Durweshes, preaching with unimportant amplifications and additions the mystic doctrines prevalent in the Sufi college to which he was attached. This view of the defendants has been accepted by the learned District Judge, and it is for this reason in the main that the learned District Judge has dismissed the suit. I do not agree with this view. I shall make no attempt to enter into a disquisition on the exact import and limits of the Sufi doctrines. The insistence on a mystical acceptance of the Love of God is a matter common to many of the recognized colleges of Sufi Durweshes. Haji Khadim Ali Shah was undoubtedly once a Sufi. It is admitted that he approved of the doctrines of the Kadiria and Chishtia orders of the Sufis, but after having gone through the voluminous evidence which has been produced in the case, I hold a strong view that the Saint, although he commenced life as a Sufi, so developed the various views which he had acquired during his youth that from the time that he became a great power for religious instruction he must be considered to have created doctrines peculiarly and essentially his own, although those doctrines had emanated largely from the Sufi doctrines which he had assimilated in his youth. His readiness to take disciples of all creeds, his insistence upon nothing else than repentance and complete acceptance of Divine Love and his extraordinary large-mindedness are to my mind indications of something more than exceptionally high principles found in a follower of recognized Sufi beliefs. He made a new religion in effect. Further, there are facts on the record which controvert absolutely the theory that the Saint commenced as a murid and ended as a sajjadanashin of a Durwesh college. The Durwesh college in question is the college of which Haji Khadim Ali Shah was the head: Had the Saint, as suggested by the defendants, been the successor of Haji Khadim Ali Shah it is impossible to suppose that he would have left Lucknow on the death of his master in 1832 and never returned (as it is shown that he never did return) to Golaganj. One of the duties of a sajjadasnashin in a recognized Sufi institution is to perform the urs ceremony of his predecessor and to wash the tomb of the founder of the college. The Saint did neither. The learned District Judge does not consider these circumstances inconsistent with the view that the Saint was the sajjadanashin of Haji Khadim Ali Shah. He points out that the tomb of Haji Khadim Ali Shah is at present surrounded by the grounds of a Mission College, and he draws the inference that the Saint would not have been likely to go near a tomb so situated. But he overlooks the fact that Haji Khadim Ali Shah died in 1832. There is no evidence to show when the Mission College in question came into existence but it certainly could not have come into existence until after the Mutiny of 1857, and for a large number of years the Saint could, had he so desired, have performed the duties of sajjadanashin of Haji Khadim Ali Shah's institution before Haji Khadim Ali Shah's tomb was enclosed in the grounds in question. It is clear that at no time did he ever perform such duties. Taking the view which I take to the effect that the Saint, if he ever did belong to a college of Durweshes as a member of their body, broke away from that college at a very early age and afterwards instituted a new teaching, a new religion, and a new order, nothing can be elicited useful for determination of this case from the principle of succession adopted in recognised colleges of Sufi Durweshes, and the rulings upon which the learned District Judge has relied for his assistance lay down no principles which can be applied to this case. We have it proved clearly and distinctly that the Saint in his lifetime declared strenuously on more than one occasion that when he died there could be no successor to him, and we have it from the evidence of his followers that they believe that although his body has undergone the ordinary process of natural decay the Spirit of Divine Love is in his tomb, and a mysterious influence emanates from there to all his disciples. It is not clear that the Saint in his lifetime ever permitted any person other than himself to receive disciples as followers of his order. But, if he did so, that circumstance would not show that he tolerated the thought of a successor. Some of his disciples undoubtedly embraced the celibate and ascetic life; others did not do so. He appears to have left largely to the choice of individual persons whether they should attach themselves entirely to a life of religion or should while adopting his doctrines pursue their ordinary avocations. It is possible that he may have permitted some of his disciples who had embraced a full religious life, to initiate others as members of his sect. It is to be remarked that the evidence shows that non-Muhammadans could be admitted as members of the sect without giving up their own religion. One of the witnesses in this case who is an initiated disciple is a Hindu. From the evidence as a whole it appears clear to me that, while the Saint admitted disciples, some of whom devoted themselves entirely to religion, and others of whom continued to pursue their ordinary avocations, and preached to all whether they were or were not his disciples, he laid down as a cardinal principle that no one could take his place after his death. I have dealt with this point sufficiently and now come to the matters with which this suit is directly concerned.

The first of these is with regard to the tomb of Kurban Ali Shah. Kurban Ali Shah, as I have already stated, was the father of the Saint and was an orthodox and religious Muhammadan, who had not embraced the life of a Durwesh or that of a religious teacher. The Saint was in no sense the spiritual successor of his father and could not have owed anything to the latter's teaching, as his father died when he was two or three years old. After the reputation of the Saint had become established certain of the less educated and the more superstitious made a practice of worshipping at the tomb of Haji Kurban Ali Shah and presented offerings there, and finally a religious fair has come into existence at Dewa on the recognized date of the father's death where offerings of substantial value are made. The Saint in his lifetime did not discourage the making of these offerings or the prayers at the tomb of his father; in accordance with his principle of retaining no property he took the offerings and distributed them in charity. In the Saint's lifetime an enclosure was constructed by offerings of his followers round the tomb of his father.

Before the Saint took up his residence in Dewa he visited the place periodically and in 1876 a certain M. Zahiruddin, a Pleader of the Bara Banki District, built a house at Dewa at a sort of khanqah for the accommodation of the Saint and his visitors. Additions were made to this building by the Raja of Ramnagar about 1880 and in 1886 further additions were made by Mr. Justice Sharfuddin. It was used as a khanqah accordingly. Another khanqah was built by Thakur Pancham Singh for the accommodation of visitors in 1900 or 1901. After the death of the Saint his disciples raised a large sum of money. Out of the subscription so raised a costly mausoleum and a mosque were erected. The Saint had been buried on the premises of the old khanqah in which he had resided. That khanqah was pulled down and the present mausoleum and the mosque are erected on its site. When the Saint died his disciples appointed at a large meeting which was convened Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim, the Saint's sister's daughter's son, in some sort of capacity to look after the tombs and the existing khanqah and to superintend the construction of the new buildings. This Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim died in 1915.

The dispute which has now arisen is as follows:—The plaintiffs as the Saint's disciples and representing the subscribers to the buildings request the Court to frame a scheme of management. Certain of the defendants put forward a claim that this is not a public trust but a private Durwesh institution in which Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim succeeded the Saint as sajjadanashin, that the Court has no right to interfere in the matter, and that the management of the property should be left entirely to the sajjadanashin who has succeeded Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim. There is a dispute as to who has succeeded Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim. This dispute has not been determined by the learned District Judge. We understand that the question of succession to Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim is at present before another Court. Others of the defendants assert that the offerings should be divided among the members of the Saint's family under the provisions of the Hanafi law. I have already stated that there is an annual religious fair on the recognized date of the death of the Saint's father at which substantial offerings are made at his grave. Since the death of the Saint another and much more important religious fair has come into existence at which offerings are made in the mausoleum of the Saint himself. The dispute before this Court is largely with regard to these offerings. The plaintiffs desire that the expenses for the upkeep of the buildings, a proper provision for the ceremonial, and the entertainment of the recognized officials and attendants at the mosque and at the graves should be met from these offerings, and that the Court should prepare a scheme directing how much should be disbursed and how the balance should be disposed of. The learned District Judge took the view that there was a recognized college of Durweshes and that the Civil Courts had no right to interfere. As I have already stated, I do not accept his view that there was anything of the nature of a recognized college of Durweshes. But I do not accept the plaintiffs' case in entirety. In the first place the offerings made at the tomb of the Saint's father stand in a different category to the offerings made in the mausoleum. The followers of the Saint have no concern with the offerings made at the tomb of the Saint's father. Those are not offerings in any way made to the Saint, or to the sect, or to his followers, and in the preparation of the scheme no provision can be made for the receipt of those offerings. It is not for us to say in this case who in particular is entitled to them or whether they should go to the family of Haji Kurban Ali Shah. A great deal of unnecessary controversy has taken place with regard to the exact position of Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim. The learned District Judge has been greatly affected by the facts that on the appointment of Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim certain formalities were observed such as are ordinarily observed at the time of installation of the sajjadanashin in a Sufi sect and that Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim was on many occasions treated by disciples of the Saint (some of them persons of standing) as sajjadanashin. All this is besides the point, in view of my finding that the Saint did not belong to any Sufi body. As there is no body there are no recognized rules of succession. The appointment of Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim was an appointment made by the followers of the Saint of their own free will and it does not in any way bind the Court to appoint a successor to the office of Saiyid Muhammad

Ibrahim (whatever the office may be) in the manner in which Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim was appointed. Saiyid Muhammad Ibrahim is dead now, and it is immaterial what he was appointed to do. The Court in my opinion has a perfect right to frame a scheme for the management of the mausoleum, the mosque, and the khanqah, and as has been established conclusively by the evidence, it is necessary that such a scheme should be prepared. It has been argued that many of the offerings which are made at the mausoleum are not made to the sect of the Saint but to the memory of the Saint himself and if they are made to the memory of the Saint himself, they should go to his family and not to his followers. As the case stands at present it is impossible to say how many of the worshippers made offerings at the mausoleum to the sect of the Saint and how many make them to the memory of the Saint. In preparing a scheme it will be possible to direct that the worshippers should be instructed in the difference of the objects and that separate receptacles should be made for offerings for one purpose or the other.

The general conclusion at which I have arrived is that the Saint was unconnected with any recognized religious order, that he founded a new order for himself, that the management of his mausoleum and the mosque and the khanqah is a constructive trust created for public purposes of a religious nature, and that the direction of the Court is necessary to the administration of the trust. It has been fully established that it is necessary to settle a scheme for such management.

The appeal is accordingly allowed except with regard to the management of the tomb of Haji Kurban Ali Shah and the disposal of the offerings made there. As the appellants have succeeded to the extent of something like three quarters of their claim, I direct that the respondents pay three quarters of their own costs and three quarters of the costs of the appellants in both Courts and that the appellants pay one quarter of their own costs and one-quarter of the costs of the respondents in both Courts.

The following is the scheme which I have adopted after consultation with my learned colleague:—

SHARFUDDIN v. MAQBULUNNISA.

Draft Scheme.

1. This Trust shall be called the Haji Waris Ali Shah Mausoleum Trust of Dewa.
2. It shall comprise the mausoleum of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah and the mosque and the khanqah attached to it built by his disciples and followers by subscription and shall include gifts and offerings made at the mausoleum or outside it for the purposes of the trust and any property that may hereafter be acquired from the income derived from the trust property.
3. The object of the trust shall be—
 - (a) to maintain the mausoleum, mosque and khanqah in proper repairs and good sanitary condition and to make such improvements therein as its funds permit;
 - (b) to arrange for the performance of the urs and fatiha ceremonies at the mausoleum and for the lighting of the same in accordance with the existing usage;
 - (c) to provide facilities for the performance of worship and religious ceremonies by the disciples and followers of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah and for persons visiting the said mausoleum, mosque or khanqah for religious purposes;
 - (d) to arrange for the charitable distribution of alms and gifts of food and clothing to the poor in honour of the memory of the Saint;
 - (e) to take such steps as the committee of management may deem necessary for carrying on the teaching of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah.
4. The trust shall be administered by a committee consisting of ten members:—
 - (a) four of them shall be elected by the Muhammadan gentlemen for the time being of the Municipal Board of Bara Banki;
 - (b) four by the Muhammadan gentlemen for the time being of the District Board of Bara Banki;
 - (c) two shall be nominated by the Local Government.
5. In making selections under rule 4, classes (a) and (b), preference will be given as far as practicable to the disciples and followers of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah or to those who have contributed Rs. 500 or over to the objects of the trust or the raising of the existing mausoleum, mosque and khanqah in honour of his memory.

6. The committee shall maintain a register of subscribers who have paid Rs. 500 or over to the objects of the trust or to the construction of the present mausoleum, mosque and khanqah, or pay such sum hereafter.

7. No person shall be eligible to be member of the committee unless he has an income of at least Rs. 500 p. m. and is a Muhammadan of the Hanafi persuasion or is a disciple or follower of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah.

8. Vacancies occurring in classes (a) and (b) of rule 4 shall be filled up by election by the Muhammadan members of the various bodies therein mentioned. Vacancies occurring in class (c) of the same rule shall be filled up by the Local Government.

9. The committee shall elect a President and a Secretary from among its members for a period not exceeding two years at a time, unless a vacancy occurs earlier, and in any case the retiring President and Secretary shall be eligible for re-election.

10. The committee shall meet, as far as possible, once in every quarter to examine the accounts of receipts and expenditure for the preceding quarter and pass such orders thereon as it may deem fit, and consider any other matter connected with the administration of the shrine and its property or for carrying out the objects of the trust which may be laid before the meeting or for which the meeting may have been adjourned.

11. Any member absenting himself from the meetings of the committee for a period of one year shall be liable to be removed from his office by a resolution of the committee.

12. A member shall be liable to be removed from his office for misconduct or misbehaviour or if his annual income falls below Rs. 500 by a resolution of the committee, provided that not less than six members vote for his removal on an application being made for that purpose to the District Judge having jurisdiction over the shrine and its property.

13. In the absence of the president, the members present at any meeting shall elect one of their number to preside over the meeting.

AHMAD v. RAHMATAN.

14. The proceedings and resolutions of all meetings of the committee shall be recorded in a book to be kept for the purpose and shall be signed by the president or chairman for the time being or attested in such manner as it may by resolution prescribe.

15. Three members shall form a quorum for the meetings of the committee; but where a meeting has been adjourned for want of a quorum the business before it may be transacted although a quorum is not present, provided that no business which was not announced for consideration at the original meeting shall be disposed of at the adjourned meeting.

16. The committee shall appoint a manager and such servants to look after the shrine and its property as it may consider necessary and shall have power to fine, suspend, remove or dismiss them at any time it thinks proper.

17. The committee shall exercise close supervision over all the affairs of the trust and the proceedings of the manager and other servants so as to prevent defalcations, mismanagement or discomfort of the persons visiting the shrine.

18. All offerings made at the tomb or on the roof of the mausoleum shall be taken by the committee, which shall collect the same and debit the amount realised each day in the accounts.

19. The committee shall keep a box in the shrine close to the tomb to serve as a receptacle for offerings made for the benefit of the heirs of the late Haji Waris Ali Shah and the proceeds of such box shall from day to day or from time to time, as may be convenient, be made over to such persons as may be found to be the lawful heirs of the said Saint.

20. The manager shall be bound to keep proper accounts of all receipts and expenditure both in money and goods and to submit all such accounts to the committee in such manner and at such times as the committee may direct.

21. The manager shall not incur any expenditure without previously obtaining the sanction of the committee to it. The manager shall be responsible for the safe custody of all moneys which may come into his hands on account of the committee and of the goods belonging to the mausoleum, mosque and khanqah.

22. Any amount in excess of Rs. 100 shall be deposited with the secretary, who shall arrange for its safe custody in such manner as the committee may determine.

23. The committee shall from time to time by resolutions declare which two persons will be authorized to sign receipts or orders of payment on its behalf.

24. The executive management of the shrine and its property shall be vested in the manager under the immediate supervision of the secretary and the general control of the committee.

25. The committee shall sue and be sued in the name of the trust.

26. Any application made in connection with this trust in accordance with any of the above rules shall be deemed to have been made in continuation of the present proceedings.

27. It will be lawful to this Court to amend or alter this scheme in any particular on its own initiative or on a motion being made on that behalf by not less than six members of the committee.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), s. 17—Minor, appointment of, guardian of—Mother, right of—Reversioner, right of, as against step-father.

An infant minor's mother, even in case of her re-marriage, is the natural guardian of the person of the minor. [p. 108, col. 1.]

A reversioner of the deceased father of the minor is a fit person to be appointed guardian of the property of the minor as against the new husband of the minor's mother. [p. 108, col. 1.]

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Jhelum,

SHEOLAL SAHU v. SAGAR MAL.

dated the 5th February 1916, rejecting the application.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant is related to the minor as shown in the following tree.

Mussammāt Rahmatan is a lady with a tragic history. She first married Fattch, who was hanged for committing a murder. She then married Nur who was murdered. She then married the third brother, Bahadur who also was murdered. She has now married again. The infant, Mukhan, is the daughter of Bahadur, so it appears. She is far too young to be taken from her mother, who is the natural guardian of the person of the minor.

As to the property there were three applicants in the lower Court, viz., Ahmad, first cousin of the girl's father, and a paternal aunt and the maternal grandfather. The property is large enough in my opinion to make it expedient that someone should be appointed a guardian. The Senior Subordinate Judge says most of the property has come from the child's grandmother. This is not clear. What appears from the record is that 1415 kanals 1 marla came to Sharf, father of Bahadur, by gift from his mother-in-law. The rest apparently Sharf got from his father. I fail to see why Musammāt Rahmatan's new husband should have the handling of any of this land. It would be best to appoint a reversioner as guardian, and unless the donor's collaterals claim the land would go to Sharf's nephews apparently, and so I speak of them as reversioners.

Mr. Nanak Chand also speaks of some land which Musammāt Rahmatan got from her brother. This presumably still belongs to Musammāt Rahmatan and not to the minor. But Musammāt Rahmatan may at any time wish to get it mutated in her child's name. I do not see that Ahmad has any claim to take charge of this land.

I so far accept the appeal as to appoint Ahmad guardian of the paternal estate of the minor, i.e., of whatever she has inherited from her father. This appointment is made subject to Ahmad's giving security, the extent of which and the time for furnishing which the learned Senior Subordinate Judge will decide.

No order as to costs of this appeal.

Appeal accepted.

JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—This second appeal comes before us from the decision of the District Judge of Gaya, reversing the decree pronounce-

SHEO LAL SAHU v. SAGAR MAL.

ed by the Subordinate Judge dismissing the plaintiff's claim in this suit.

The plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 are members of a partnership carrying on business under the style and title of "Anand Mall Sagar Mall," the business being that of cloth merchants.

The partnership dealings commenced on the 29th October 1906, and continued up to the 15th of March 1911; but the partnership does not seem to have been dissolved. The defendants Nos. 1 and 2 are father and son, members of a joint family carrying on business. These defendants Nos. 1 and 2 had dealings with the plaintiff's firm and they contracted a debt which prior to the time of action amounted to Rs. 1,020-9-6. There was a dispute as to this amount and eventually the defendant No. 1 signed the partnership account book admitting his liability to the amount claimed, and agreeing to pay interest at the rate of 12 annas per cent. per mensem upon the amount so admitted by him to be due until payment. Thus at the time that this suit was instituted a debt of Rs. 1,296-3 6 was due by the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 to the partnership.

The learned Subordinate Judge dismissed the case on the ground that he found on issue No. 4 that the suit was improperly constituted. In the suit as constituted in its present form the plaintiff sues in his own name as one member of the firm and named the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 as debtors to the firm. He also named as party defendants the defendants Nos. 3 and 4, who are his joint co-partners. The scheme of the plaint clearly shows that the plaintiff was seeking to recover the debt in suit as a debt due to the partnership. It is well settled that one partner cannot alone sue to recover a debt due to the partnership; but it is equally well settled that a partner may use the name of his firm and the names of his co-partners to enable him to recover a debt due to the partnership firm; and that any individual member of a partnership who is unwilling to join in recovering the debt has only a right to claim as against the partner who desires to sue an indemnity for costs. Now in the form in which this plaint was prepared I think that the Subordinate

Judge was right in holding that the suit was not properly constituted. The Subordinate Judge, however, did not dispose of any question of fact, having dismissed the suit on the preliminary ground. The learned Judge in appeal came to the conclusion that the suit was one really by the firm to recover a debt due to the firm; and as all the parties to the partnership business were on the record he considered he could give a decree, and decide the outstanding question of fact which had not been determined by the Subordinate Judge; and the learned Judge on appeal accordingly pronounced a decree in favour of the partnership firm and directed that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 should pay costs to the plaintiff personally. Now the relief which was given by the learned Judge in appeal was substantially right; but in order to make the record conform with his judgment it is essential that the record must be amended. The learned Judge if he wanted to give the relief which he has given by the order he has made should have, I think, amended the record so as to bring it into harmony with the judgment of the Court.

We think it is open to us to make the necessary amendment in the record so that it may accord with the decision arrived at by the learned Judge. Order I, rule 10, gives very wide powers to the Court to amend the record; and this is a case in which we think we are justified in applying its provisions. We do not intend to make a person a party as plaintiff against his will. All that we shall decide is that the plaint be amended by describing the partnership firm as plaintiff and specifying in paragraph No. 1 of the plaint the names of the members constituting the partnership; and we shall strike out of the record the names of the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 as defendants to the suit. Thus the record will be brought into harmony with the judgment of the learned Judge in appeal, the partnership firm suing to recover the partnership debt, the suit being instituted by one partner in the name of the firm on behalf of the other partners. This is a mere technicality and affords no prejudice to the defendant No. 2, and thus with the record amended the decree will stand. The authority for the proposition of the law which we have laid down will be found in the case of Seal v. Kingston (1). At page 582 the Court of Appeal says: "One of several partners has a clear right to use the names of the other partners. If they object to their names being used, they may apply for an indemnity against the costs to which they might be subjected by the use of their names."

Accordingly we shall disallow this appeal but we will direct that Sagar Mal shall pay to the defendant No. 2 his costs of this appeal. The defendant No. 2 will pay to the plaintiff personally the costs in the lower Appellate and in the Court of First Instance as the surviving joint debtor, defendant No. 1 having died pending the suit.

CHAPMAN, J.—I agree.

Application under Order XLV, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council against the decree of the Hon'ble. Court, dated the 8th July 1916.

Mr. J. M. Banerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. Baleshwari Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The value of the subject-matter of the suit and of the proposed appeal to His Majesty in Council is less than Rs. 10,000. Furthermore this Court confirmed the decision of the Court of first instance. The case prima facie does not comply with the requirements of section 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are, however, asked to certify that the case is "otherwise a fit one" for appeal on the ground that a substantial question of law is involved. The question of law, if any, is the construction of a Will as to whether the person to whom the property was bequeathed took it "as an adopted" son and on that condition, or that he was entitled to the property under the terms of the Will irrespective whether he was adopted or not. It is difficult to say that the construction of any particular document is a substantial question of law, that is, a question of law of general public importance. No doubt some portions of the Will closely resembled the terms of a Will which was considered by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Lali v. Murlidhar (4), but the terms of the whole Will are far from identical. The Will which their Lordships of the Privy Council were considering, was embodied in the wajib-ul-arz and their Lordships seem to have thought that one of the objects of the testator was to establish a particular custom. We think that the two documents are quite capable of being distinguished and we are unable to certify that any substantial question of law of general importance is involved. We accordingly reject the application with costs.

Application rejected.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 24—Transfer of suit—Notice to parties, whether necessary—Jurisdiction to transfer suits—Senior Subordinate Judge, powers of—Punjab Courts Act (III of 1914), ss. 37, 44.

The transfer of a suit under section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code without giving notice to the parties is illegal.

A Subordinate Judge has no jurisdiction to exercise the powers conferred by section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code, unless such powers have been delegated to him by the District Judge with the previous sanction of the Local Government as provided by sections 37 and 44 of the Punjab Courts Act, 1914.

Petition, under section 44 of Act III of 1914, for revision of the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Lahore, dated 28th August 1916, transferring the case from the Court of the Munsif, Lahore, to that of the Subordinate Judge, 1st class, Lahore.

Mr. Saunders, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff-petitioner has come up to this Court under section 44 of Act III of 1914 complaining against the order passed by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge of Lahore, by which order on application filed by the defendants-respondents he transferred the case from the Court of Sheikh Ata Ilahi, Munsif of Lahore, to the Court of Lala Maya Ram, Subordinate Judge. On behalf of the petitioner Mr. Saunders has urged that the action of the Senior Subordinate Judge was against law inasmuch as he passed the order of transfer without giving notice to his client. He also urged that the Senior Subordinate Judge of Lahore had no jurisdiction in such matters and that there had been no legal delegation of the powers conferred by section 24, Civil Procedure Code, on District Courts to the Senior Subordinate Judge, Lahore. From enquiries I have made, it appears that this latter contention is correct. Under section 37 of Act III of 1914 the District Judge may, with the previous sanction of the Local Government, delegate to any Subordinate Judge in his District the powers conferred on a PARTAB BALI v. BINDESHRI PRASAD SINGH.

District Court by section 24 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As I have said, I have been unable to find that the sanction of the Local Government for any such delegation by the District Court to the Senior Subordinate Judge has been made and I, therefore, consider that the Senior Subordinate Judge is not authorised to hear applications to exercise the powers under section 24, Civil Procedure Code. In any event section 24, Civil Procedure Code, is perfectly clear and notice was bound to be given. The order is also bad for that reason.

I, therefore, accept this revision and set aside the order transferring the case to Mr. Maya Ram and direct that the case proceed before the Court of Sheikh Ata Ilahi. The respondents must pay petitioner's costs in this Court.

Appeal accepted.

Dasaundh, right to, whether connotes right to possession or under-proprietary right in land.

A right to cash dasaundh in a village is in the nature of a charge on its rents. It does not connote a right to possession of the village nor can it be deemed to be an under-proprietary right in its land. [p. 112, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Gonda, dated the 29th March 1913.

Babus Jiban Krishna Banerji and Aditya Prasad, for the Appellants.

Babu Basdeo Lal and Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals arise out of rival suits for pre-emption, brought by the appellants to each of these appeals in respect of a sale of proprietary rights of village Basbharya, effected by the Court of Wards in charge of the Ajudhya Estate in favour of the defendants-respondents. The allegation of the plaintiffs Partab Bali and Sheo Narayan, in Suit No. 144 of 1912, was that they were under-proprietors and inhabitants of Mauza Basbharya, and also held a share in Mahal Behra Chak situated in the said village, and were entitled to a right of pre-emption as against the defendant-vendee, who was a stranger. The allegation of the plaintiffs, Gokaran and eleven others, in the other suit, was that they were under-proprietors of the said village and had a preferential right of purchase as against the defendant-vendee, who had no connection with the village. The defendant-vendee denied that either of the plaintiffs had any right in the village. He further pleaded that the plaintiffs had lost their right to pre-emption, if any, by reason of their failure to deposit the purchase money on receiving intimation of the proposed sale within the time allowed by section 11 of Act XVIII of 1876, and that the plaintiffs were estopped from claiming the property.

The learned Subordinate Judge found that the notice sent by the Court of Wards under section 10 of the Act was issued after the sale was effected and was consequently of no avail and that the plaintiffs did not refuse to purchase the property. He, however, dismissed the claim on the ground that neither of the plaintiffs had any proprietary or under-proprietary interest in the land of the village. The plaintiffs in each suit have appealed and the main question for consideration is whether they hold any proprietary or under-proprietary interest in the land of the village and have a right to sue for pre-emption.

It appears from the settlement decree obtained by Bhawani Shankar and others on the 10th March 1875 against the Court of Wards in charge of the Ajudhya Estate that a right of pukhtadar was claimed by the predecessors-in-title of the plaintiffs to these suits, but was disallowed by the Settlement Officer and that what was granted was a right to cash dasaundh or a 1/10th share in the gross rental of the village (Exhibits A-6 and 2). A right to cash dasaundh does not, however, connote a right to possession of the village and as held in Deputy Commissioner, Gonda v. Bhagwan (1) and Parmeshar Dat v. Raja Mohammad Abul Hasan Khan (2), such a right cannot be deemed to be an under-proprietary right in the land of the village. The entry of the names of the plaintiffs as under-proprietors in the recent settlement is, in the face of the settlement decree, of no value. In 1894 the Court of Wards issued a notice of ejectment against Sheoratan, brother of Gokaran, treating him as a tenant-at-will. Sheoratan contested the notice and succeeded in getting it cancelled on the ground that he was holding the plots of land in regard to which the notice was issued as a quasi sub proprietor, entitled to dasaundh (Exhibit 7). The Maharaja of Ajudhya subsequently filed a suit against Sheoratan for a declaration that the latter had no under-proprietary or birtdari right in the village, and obtained a decree from the Court of the Munsif of Gonda on the 27th June 1906 (Exhibit A 10). In 1899 the Ajudhya Estate made a similar attempt to eject Patan, the predecessor-in-interest of some of the other appellants, and was unsuccessful in the Revenue Court, but the estate succeeded in obtaining a decree from the Civil Court, which was confirmed by this Court on the 30th January 1902 (Exhibit A 11). No question of adverse possession, therefore, arises. None of the plaintiffs in either suit holds an under-proprietary right in the land of the village as distinct from a cash dasaundh which is in the nature of a charge on the rents. Partab Bali and Sheo Narayan plaintiffs have also failed to establish that they hold any proprietary right in any land of the village in question.

The appeals, therefore, fail and are dismissed with costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), s. 29—Rent reserved with temporary remission, whether recoverable in full—Penalty.

Where the original rent of an occupancy holding was Rs. 18 a year, but, for some unexplained reason, in a kabuliyat taken from the ryot, the rent was stated to be Rs. 19-14-0, out of which, for the term of the kabuliyat, a remission was allowed and the actual rent payable for the term was stated to be Rs. 12 only, and it was further provided that if the tenant failed to take a fresh settlement at an enhanced rent on the expiry of the term of the kabuliyat he would be liable to pay the full rent reserved in the kabuliyat:

Held, that the true rent of the holding, when the kabuliyat was executed, being Rs. 12, the provision as to the payment of rent at the rate of Rs. 19-14-0 offended against or was a device to evade the provisions of section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, and was, therefore, inoperative. [p. 114, col. 1.]

Per Fletcher, J.—That the provision as to the enhanced rent was a penal one, held in terrorem over the head of the tenant to make him come to the landlord and enter into a new settlement after the expiry of the kabuliyat, and was merely an attempt to evade the provisions of section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act [p. 114, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Rangpur, dated the 4th December 1914, modifying that of the Munsif, second Court, Gaibandha, dated the 24th November 1913.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The kabuliyat in question set out in its heading in a tabular form the name of the tenant, the area of the holding, the total rent fixed (jama gujasta), which was stated to be Rs. 19-14-0, the remission granted till the period of the kabuliyat, viz., Rs. 7-14-0, and the rent payable on demand (talabi jama) viz., Rs. 12 only.

The body of the kabuliyat, in its material portions, ran thus:—

“* * * Fixing and agreeing to the annual rent at Rs. 19-14-0 out of which a sum of Rs. 7-12-0 is kept in abeyance during the whole period of the kabuliyat owing to my poverty and agreeing to the balance of Rs. 12 as the rent payable on demand, etc.

“On the expiration of the term I shall file a regular kabuliyat at an enhanced rent within a month and take a patta. If within the aforesaid period I do not come to a fresh settlement, then immediately on the expiry of the term or at any time thereafter you will be entitled to realise rent year after year at the full rate of Rs. 19-14-0 according to your wish.”

Babu Nagendra Nath Ghose, for the Appellants.

Babu Atul Chandra Gupta, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs against a judgment of the learned Additional Subordinate Judge of Rangpur, dated the 4th December 1914, reversing the decision of the Munsif of Gaibandha. The suit was brought to recover the rent due under a kabuliyat. The first Court decreed the suit. On appeal to the learned Additional Subordinate Judge, he reversed that decision. It has been found by the learned Subordinate Judge that the holding is an old holding and that the tenants have a right of occupancy in the land within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The rent was originally Rs. 18, but for some reason which the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court was not satisfied with—and he was also not satisfied as to whether the truth had been told to him—the cash rent was reduced in the kabuliyat sued upon to Rs. 12, but it was stated that the balance of the rent, namely, Rs. 7-14-0 was kept in suspense and would not be payable during the term of the kabuliyat, but that if the tenants fail to come to a new agreement as to the rent to be paid to the landlords at the expiration of the term, then a rent of Rs. 19-14-0 was to be payable. I do not know whether in this case it was stated that the suspense for three years was granted by the landlords owing to the charitable feeling that they bore to mankind in general and to these tenants in particular. But it is a matter for comment that no day practically passes before the Court, at any rate before this Bench, without leases of this sort being brought up in review. There can be little doubt that these leases are put forward by the landlords with intent to evade the stringent provisions contained in section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. It cannot be that a particular Bench of the Court should every day have its attention called to cases where the landlord out of the good nature and kindness of heart has voluntarily reduced the rent for a few years owing to the poverty or other circumstances of the tenants and subsequently sues for rent at the original rate and the tenant litigates with his landlord on the terms of his lease up to the final Court of Appeal. The present case seems to me to be a perfectly simple one. The cash rent, the talabi jama, i. e., the rent to be paid is stated to be Rs. 18. Why the original cash rent was reduced to Rs. 12, no satisfactory explanation has been given. The story why Rs. 7-14-0 was kept in suspense has been totally disbelieved by the learned Subordinate Judge and there cannot be any doubt that the learned Judge meant to find that the rent payable under the terms of this kabuliyat was Rs. 12. Then it was pointed out by Mr. Gupta, who conducted the appeal on behalf of the tenant-respondents, that the condition for enhancement was purely in terrorem—a penalty held over the heads of the tenants—that unless the tenants should come to the landlords and enter into a new agreement satisfactory to the landlords, the rent would be enhanced from Rs. 12 to Rs. 19-14. That is, a method of enhancement which is altogether opposed to the terms of the Bengal Tenancy Act and such an enhancement, in my opinion, cannot be supported. I think in this case that the provision as to enhanced rent was merely one held in terrorem over the heads of the tenants to make them come to the landlords and enter into a new settlement and that it was only in the event of such settlement not being assented to by the tenants it was provided that the suspense rent should become payable. But that was merely an attempt to evade the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act and to enhance the rent in the manner prohibited by section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In my opinion, the result arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge is correct. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

RICHARDSON, J.—In my opinion, there is a sufficient finding in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court that the true rent of the holding when the kabuliyat in question was executed was Rs. 12. If that be so, it is clear that the kabuliyat offends or is a device to evade the provisions of section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and is inoperative. The landlord cannot, therefore, without taking proper proceedings for enhancement recover rent at a higher rate than Rs. 12. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 61:—'Landlord,' meaning of—Co-sharer collecting rent separately from tenant, power of—Ejectment.

The word 'landlord' in section 61 of the Oudh Rent Act means the person or persons to whom a tenant is liable to pay the whole of his rent. A petty co-sharer who collects rent separately from a tenant is not, therefore, by reason of an unsatisfied decree for rent entitled alone to eject the tenant. [p. 115, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

HOLMS, S. M.—(August 8, 1916).—I cannot agree with the view taken by the lower Courts. It appears that in this village which is not partitioned, each co-sharer collects from each tenant his share of the rent and two of the co-sharers, the present respondents, obtained a decree for arrears of rent against the appellant for their share of the rent only. These two co-sharers now wish to eject the appellant under section 61 from the whole of his holding on account of the unsatisfied decree for their quota of the rent. It is admitted by both sides that there are two lambardars in the village, one Mumtaz Ali (one of the respondents) and the other Bishambhar Nath, and that their duties are not divided. Bishambhar Nath does not wish to eject the appellant. It seems to me that the word 'landlord' in section 61 must be understood to mean the person or persons to whom a tenant is liable to pay the whole of his rent, and that it is opposed both to the law and to ordinary convenience that a petty co-sharer who collects rent separately from a tenant should, by reason of an unsatisfied decree for rent, be entitled alone to eject the tenant.

I would set aside the orders of the lower Courts and decree the suit for recovery of possession, respondents paying costs throughout.

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Shahabad.

Mr. Sushil Madho Mullick, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Rajindra Prasad and Saroshi Charan Mitra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for partition. The plaintiffs' case appears to have been that they and the defendants were members of a Hindu family to whom some fifty years ago or more a grant of 127 bighas of land had been made. Subsequently to that grant there had been a partition between the plaintiffs' branch and the defendants' branch of the family of 45 bighas out of the 127 bighas. The suit prayed for a partition of the remaining 82 bighas. The original Court held against the plaintiffs' case and held that the plaintiffs had no joint title in respect of these 82 bighas of any kind.

In appeal the District Judge Mr. Monahan held that the plaintiffs' case had been made out; that the grant of the entire 127 bighas was originally joint; that there had been a partial partition, and that the plaintiffs still have a joint title. There was an appeal to the Calcutta High Court. The Calcutta High Court remanded the case for a fresh disposal. They did so upon the ground that the learned District Judge had nowhere in his judgment referred to the question of limitation. The learned Judges, however, did not in their judgment set aside the judgment of Mr. Monahan, and in disposing of the cross-appeal they say that the cross-appeal was concluded by the finding of fact arrived at by Mr. Monahan.

Upon the case coming on before Mr. Monahan's successor Mr. Rowland, it was contended before Mr. Rowland that the entire case had been re-opened and that the appellants-defendants were entitled to re-open the question of title to the land. Mr. Rowland held that he was bound by the findings of his predecessor upon that point and that it was only open to him to go into the question of limitation. He held that for the purposes of establishing limitation it was necessary to prove that there had at some time been a definite ouster of the plaintiffs. "There being no evidence to that effect the plea of limitation must fail. I accordingly dismiss this appeal."

The defendants now again appeal to this Court. After some discussion it was conceded that it was in any event open to the District Judge to go into the question whether there was an original grant of the entire 127 bighas to this family or not. It was contended before us that from the fact of there having been a partial partition of this 127 bighas it should have been presumed that there was an entire partition of the entire 127 bighas. It appears to me that if there be any doctrine of presumption of that kind it cannot refer to a specific area of land; it is only applicable to a case of a Hindu family the properties of which are not ascertained. If then one side can show that under some sort of partition some of the members of the family held separate properties, there probably would be some presumption that the entire family properties had been partitioned; but where there is specific evidence that the whole area of 127 bighas had been partially partitioned, that evidence is in itself sufficient to dispose of any presumption that there was an entire partition of the whole. In any case it seems to me clear from the judgment of the High Court in appeal that it was not open to the learned District Judge to interfere with the finding of his predecessor upon the question whether there was a partial partition or not, for if there had been a complete partition it would be quite unnecessary to consider any question of limitation at all; the suit would have failed if there had already been a complete partition. The remand of the question of limitation by the High Court assumes that there is a right to partition, unless that right can be shown to have been defeated by the law of limitation.

It is then contended in appeal that the principle under which co-owners can only be defeated by the law of limitation by evidence that one co-owner has been in adverse possession of the property does not apply to a case in which there has been a partial partition. No authority for this contention has been cited. The authority which was mentioned is an authority which is against the appellants, namely, the case of Vaidyanath Aiyar v. Aiyasamy Aiyar (1), where at page 197 it is said: "Where a member of a joint family is in possession of joint family properties and a partial partition takes place leaving him, however, in possession of certain properties not divided between them, his possession will still continue to be the possession of the other members of the family though they may have been divided, till some event happens which renders his possession exclusive or hostile to the others."

All the contentions made on behalf of the appellants fail. It has not been suggested that upon the facts of the case the learned District Judge fell into error in saying that there was nothing to support the plea of ouster or adverse possession. The result is that this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal from the decree of the Commissioner, Fyzabad, dated the 5th April 1916.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are these. In 1869 A.D. the zemindars gave a lease to two ancestors of the present appellants. The lease was for thirty years at a fixed rent and if at the end of that time the revenue was increased the rent was also to be increased. There was no mention whatever of hereditary rights. The thirty years expired in 1899 A. D. and some four or five years later the last of the two lessees died. Since then the appellants have been holding the land and in the receipts for rent given to them the rent has been described as money paid under the lease. Most certainly, apart from the subsequent conduct of the zemindars, the tenure created by the lease was not heritable except possibly for an unexpired period of the thirty years. There are several rulings to support this view, as for example, Nabi Bukhsh v. Muhammad Mohsin Ali (1) and Thakur Muhammad Nawab Ali Khan v. Mathra (2) and several decisions of the Judicial Commissioner's Court. It is urged that the lease must be interpreted by the subsequent conduct of the zemindars and that even if the result of the conduct is not held to justify the lease being treated as a perpetual heritable lease, then at any rate the appellants are entitled to hold the land for their lifetime. In the case of an ordinary lease for a term of years when the lessee is allowed to hold on after the lease has come to a conclusion, the result is not that he is to hold on for his lifetime but he is merely treated as holding from year to year, and I do not think in the present case the result can be otherwise. Hindu Law—Widow—Surrender—Gift of whole estate to presumptive reversioner, validity of.

A Hindu widow is competent to surrender by way of gift the whole of her husband's estate in favour of the presumptive reversioner of her deceased husband. [p. 117, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 14th July 1915.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Sir Sundar Lal, The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Uma Shankar Bajpai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts as found by the Court below are as follows:—That Musammat Jaichha Kunwar is the widow of a separated Hindu; that the second defendant Shivatahal Rai is the nearest reversioner at the present time; and that Musammat Jaichha Kunwar had, on the 14th of April 1914, transferred the whole of her husband's estate to Shivatahal Rai, the next reversioner, without any consideration whatsoever. The plaintiff-appellant, whose suit has been dismissed by both the Courts below, is a more remote reversioner, and his plea before us is that upon the facts found, the Courts below ought to have declared that the deed of gift, dated the 14th of April 1914, is not binding upon him after the death of the widow. We have no hesitation in saying that the suit has been properly dismissed by the Court below. The rule of law which governs such a case as this is to be found in the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (1). At page 20 of the report their Lordships say as follows:—“The High Court of Allahabad, indeed, does not recognise the validity of surrenders in favour, or alienations with the consent of, presumptive reversioners so as to defeat the title of the actual reversioner at the time of the widow's death. But this restriction is at variance with the principle itself, and is not in accordance with the practice in other parts of India in which the Mitakshara Law prevails. Their Lordships have not been referred to any cases in the Province of Oudh in which this restriction has been acted upon; and though they would be unwilling to extend the widow's power of alienation beyond its present limits, they cannot adopt the further limitation which the Allahabad High Court has sought to establish. They agree with the High Court of Calcutta, that ordinarily the consent of the whole body of persons constituting the next reversion should be obtained, though there may be cases in which special circumstances may render the strict enforcement of this rule impossible.”

APPAN PATRACHARIAR v. SRINIVASACHARIAR.

The present is not a case of an alienation with the consent of presumptive reversioners. Our attention has been called to a decision of this Court reported as Bakhtawar v. Bhagwana (2), in which the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council has been considered. That was a case of gift by a widow to a third person with the consent of the next reversioner, and this Court held that the decision in Bajrangi Singh's case (1) covered only alienations for consideration with the consent of reversioners, and not cases of gifts or transfers without consideration with such consent. The point which is now before us, that is, the surrender by a Hindu widow of the whole of her husband's estate in favour of the presumptive reversioners did not arise for decision in any of the cases to which our attention has been called. On the contrary, there are many cases in which the transfer by a widow of her husband's estate to the next reversioner has been upheld. The case reported as Bhupal Ram v. Lachma Kuar (3) is a case where a widow transferred the estate to her own daughter who was the next in the line of succession to herself. There have been several other cases in which the principle has been adopted without any hesitation whatsoever. In the present case it is moreover the whole estate which has been surrendered and not a portion of the estate. In our opinion the law on the question has been finally settled and requires no further discussion. The decision of the Court below is correct and the appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs, including fees on the higher scale. We allow no costs for the objection.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. He purchased the plaintiff lands in December 1909 from the 1st defendant. The 1st defendant had a minor step-brother who is the 2nd defendant and also an uterine sister, the 3rd defendant. The 1st and the 3rd defendants' mother was the predeceased first wife of one Srinivasachariar who died on the 14th November 1908. Within a fortnight before his death and on the 1st November 1908 (when he was on his deathbed and with the knowledge that his dissolution was not far off) he executed the Will Exhibit V (a), by which he gave the properties mentioned in the schedule A attached to the Will to his eldest son, the 1st defendant, gave the properties mentioned in the schedule B to his minor son, the 2nd defendant, and the land mentioned in the C schedule to his daughter, the 3rd defendant, besides making some other provisions. It is not denied that relatively to the A and the B schedule properties bequeathed to the two sons, the C schedule property left to the daughter is one of small value and it would not be an unreasonably large gift to be made by a very well-to-do father to his only daughter, though he has two undivided sons. It is further found that the 1st defendant, the elder of the two sons who was a major at the time of the Will, consented to this provision being made in favour of his sister and attested the Will and that the 2nd defendant's mother, the testator's second wife, also consented.

APPAN PATRACHARIAR v. SRINIVASACHARIAR.

Within a year of the testator's death, however, the widow acting as the guardian of her minor son (the 2nd defendant) repudiated in one respect the validity of the very fair testamentary arrangements made by her husband and while willing that the A schedule properties which were given to her step-son, the 1st defendant, for his share by her husband should be his and that the B schedule properties given to her son, the 2nd defendant, should belong to the said son absolutely, grudged the gift of the C schedule properties to her step-daughter, the 3rd defendant. Thereupon on the 3rd November 1909, the 1st defendant and the step-mother acting as guardian of the 2nd defendant executed the agreement Exhibit K, by which the C schedule properties were arranged to be sold and converted to cash and the sale proceeds divided equally between the two sons. It was in pursuance of this agreement that the 1st defendant sold the properties to the plaintiff in December 1909 under Exhibit A.

The lower Appellate Court held that though the properties dealt with under the Will Exhibit V (a) were ancestral properties in which the two sons of the testator owned interests by birth, a reasonable gift could be made by the father in favour of his only daughter so as to bind his sons and that such a gift, even though made by Will, would be binding on the sons if they consented to it. It also held that the 1st defendant having consented to the dispositions in the Will was bound thereby, and that the 2nd defendant though a minor at the time was also bound as consent could be given on his behalf by his mother in his interests and such consent was given. On these findings it held that the 3rd defendant became the sole owner of the C schedule properties, that is, the plaintiff lands by the testamentary gift and that the plaintiff purchased nothing but a bag of wind under the sale-deed Exhibit A. The lower Appellate Court accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit with the costs of the defendants Nos. 2 and 3.

The plaintiff's memorandum of second appeal contains 12 grounds, but leaving aside the general grounds and those which relate to the binding nature of the plaintiff's sale-deed on the 2nd defendant and those which relate to questions of fact, those which attack the legal validity of the 3rd defendant's title as claimed under the Will Exhibit V (a) may be shortly stated thus:—

(1) "The Will can only operate from the date of the death of the testator at which time all the properties would pass to the two sons by right of survivorship, being ancestral property."

(2) "It is not within the scope and powers of the guardian of a minor son to consent to the giving of property by a father to a third person."

(3) "The said consent is also inoperative as it was given by a person who was not the guardian at the time, when she so consented."

(4) "The authorities relied upon by the Subordinate Judge are clearly distinguishable and they only refer to gifts inter vivos and not to testamentary dispositions."

Besides these 4 grounds, Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar who appeared for the appellant raised a new contention before us that the document Exhibit V (a) was not a Will but was a settlement inter vivos and as it was not registered, it was wholly inoperative and invalid. But this contention was not raised in the lower Courts and not even in the grounds of the second appeal memorandum and I must decline to allow it to be raised at this stage.

As regards the 2nd and 3rd grounds, I agree with Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar that the 2nd defendant's mother was not the legal guardian of the 2nd defendant so long as his father was alive. His consent, therefore, to the testamentary dispositions under

APPAN PATRACHARIAR v. SRINIVASACHARIAR.

Exhibit V (a) cannot give legal validity to the Will, but can only be an item of the evidence proving that the dispositions under the Will were in the nature of a fair family settlement to take effect after the death of the testator and were intended to avoid disputes and litigation and to promote peace. Of course the father himself as guardian of his son could act in his son's interest.

I shall now consider the first and the fourth contentions which may be dealt with together. I think that, on the authorities, the father in a joint and undivided family can, with the consent of his adult son and with the consent of his relations who are interested in a minor son of his, make valid provisions by Will in favour of the female members of his family provided the said provisions are reasonable in extent and value. I shall refer only to a few cases.

The first and the most important case is the Privy Council decision in Brijraj Singh v. Sheodan Singh (1). The following sentence occurs in the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council at page 346: "But the property was ancestral and therefore Rao Balwant Singh, although head of the family, had no right to make a partition by Will of that property among the various members of the family except with their consent." The words I have italicised afford, in my opinion, clear indication of their Lordships' view that with "their" consent, (that is, the consent of other members of the family) a disposition of property by Will by the managing member would be binding on them after his death. No doubt, the observation is an obiter dictum, as their Lordships found in that case that the document called "Will" was really a disposition inter vivos, but I think that the dictum which was so clearly laid down is binding on this Court especially as, in my opinion, there is nothing in the Hindu Shastras opposed to the above dictum, which (if I may say so with respect) is eminently just and equitable.

In Kudutamma v. Narasimhacharyulu (2) it was held that a Hindu brother who is the managing member of a joint Hindu family would not be acting in excess of his powers as such, in giving away a reasonable portion of the joint family property to his sisters who, though married in their father's lifetime, were left, for some reason or other, without a marriage portion.

In Anivilla Sundaramayya v. Cherla Sitamma (3) it was held that a gift of 8 acres of ancestral land by a Hindu father to his daughter after marriage when the family was possessed of 200 acres of land was valid against his adult sons even without their consent.

I shall next consider the case of Arunachalla Pillai v. Sampurna Thachi (4) which, in my opinion, is a very strong case. There the undivided paternal grandfather of a minor gave a portion of the family property (about 30 per cent. in value of the whole) to his third wife and daughters with the consent of his only grandson's widowed mother. It was held that the gift was binding upon the grandson. The learned Judges say: "It is clear that it was open to the grandfather, if he had chosen and without any one's consent, to effect a partition and leave the whole of his half share to his third wife and her daughters and it was, in our opinion, clearly for the benefit of the minor for his guardians to avoid an eventuality so injurious to his interests by consenting to the alienations effected by Exhibit I." In the present case also, the testator could have separated from his two sons and taken one-third share as his separate share and given it away to his daughter, the 3rd defendant. This would have been much more to the detriment of the 2nd defendant than the provision made in the Will, by which he got half of the whole ancestral properties except the C schedule properties. In the present case, the testator could have made a gift of the C schedule properties validly to his daughter and effected a partition between his two sons during his lifetime. But with the consent of his major son and with the consent of his minor son's mother, and in what he himself, as the guardian of his minor son, considered to be in the interests of his said son, he made a gift by Will to take effect after his death, instead of by a deed to come into effect at once. I think that on the logical application of the principles laid down in the cases I have referred to above and seeing that their Lordships of the Privy Council treated the disposition by Will in certain circumstances, though of ancestral property, as standing on the same footing as dispositions by deed inter vivos, provided the consent of the parties to be affected is obtained, the family settlement made by the Will Exhibit V (a) in this case ought to be upheld. In the result the second appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Mortgage—Redemption suit—Compromise, non-registration of, effect of—Registration Act (VIII of 1871), s. 49—Mortgagee, possession of, under compromise—Adverse possession.

By an unregistered deed of compromise a mortgagor and mortgagee consented to the complete transfer of the equity of redemption to the latter. The mortgagee took possession of the property in pursuance of the compromise and both parties acted upon it for nearly forty years:

Held, that the possession of the mortgagee since the compromise was adverse to the mortgagor and his heirs. [p. 122, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Azamgarh, dated the 1st May 1915.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal preferred by the plaintiff in a suit brought for redemption of certain property. The plaintiff Khedu Rai is the heir of one Zalim Rai. In the year 1869, Zalim Rai mortgaged the property in suit to the predecessors-in-title of the present defendants first party. In the year 1876 a dispute arose between the mortgagor and the mortgagees and a case arose in the Revenue Courts in respect to the entry of names in the Record of Rights. We are informed that a grove had actually been sold by the mortgagees to the predecessors-in-title of the defendants second party. The dispute in the Revenue Court resulted in a compromise in which Zalim Rai gave up all his equity of redemption in the property. The mortgagees agreed to certain property being held by Zalim Rai and his wife as long as either of them should live, it, on their death, reverting to the mortgagees. The compromise was not registered. Entries were made in the Government record accordingly and from that date the mortgagees were recorded as the full owners of the property. The mortgage was one by conditional sale. From that time onwards the mortgagees have always been recorded as owners of the property and they dealt with it as such. In the year 1900 and again in 1904 the defendants first party transferred various portions of the property to the defendants second party. In the year 1908, a co-sharer in the village named Mahabir Rai applied for partition of his own share in the mahal. The defendants first party, on the 26th of January 1909, applied for partition of part of the property which is now in dispute, and the defendants second party applied for partition of the rest of the property which is now in dispute. On the 19th of August 1909, the present plaintiff Khedu Rai, who is the heir of Zalim Rai, applied for partition of his own share in the village and in his application laid no claim whatsoever to the property now in dispute, as a mortgagor. The partition was completed on the 20th of October 1910, and came into force on the 1st of July 1911. In 1912, the plaintiff brought the present suit for redemption of the mortgage. The Courts below have dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appeals.

HALIMA U. MATHRADAS RAMCHAND.

The first point urged on his behalf before us was that the compromise of 1876, being unregistered, conveyed no title, and under section 49 of the Registration Act, VIII of 1871, it could not be taken as evidence of any transfer of property. It is urged that there was no transfer of the equity of redemption; that the mortgagees cannot, by asserting adverse possession, change the nature of their possession, and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to redeem. On behalf of the respondents, however, it is pointed out that though the document was not registered, the parties had acted upon the transaction from the year 1876 up to the date of the present suit; that the nature of the mortgagees' possession has been changed with effect from the date of the compromise; that the defendants first party have transferred portions of the property, and that the defendants' possession has really been adverse to that of the plaintiff or his predecessor-in-title. Reliance is placed upon the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (1) and our attention has also been called to the decision in Usman Khan v. Nagalla Dasanna (2). It will be noted that the transaction of 1876 took place at a period prior to the coming into force of the Transfer of Property Act of 1882. It is true that the Registration Act was then in force, but it seems to us that this was not a case of the mortgagee merely setting up adverse possession without any act on the part of the mortgagor in the matter. In other words, the present case is not of mere unilateral action by the mortgagee. Both parties consented to the complete transfer of the equity of redemption to the mortgagees and both parties have acted upon it for very nearly forty years. The case is very similar indeed to the case reported as Usman Khan v. Dasanna (2). We think the principle of that decision and also of the decision in Mahomed Musa v. Aghore

Kumar Ganguli (1) is applicable to the present case, and we hold that the defendants have held possession of this property since the year 1876 as owners adversely to the mortgagor and his heirs. We do not think it necessary to go into the other point which has been raised in the appeal. The appeal fails and is, therefore, dismissed with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

There is no general rule of law making it necessary for a plaintiff to obtain leave of the Insolvency Court before suing the Receiver in insolvency. [p. 123, col. 1.]

A plaintiff who is not a creditor but a third person claiming adversely to the insolvent is not affected by the provisions of section 16, clause (2) (b), of the Provincial Insolvency Act, and is not, therefore, bound to obtain leave of the Court before suing the Receiver. [p. 123, col. 2.]

Section 22 of the Provincial Insolvency Act does not in any way prohibit the enforcement of rights by suit without the leave of the Court. [p. 123 col. 2.]

HAYWARD, J. C.—The plaintiff sued for declaration of ownership of certain property in her possession as against the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, who were Receivers in insolvency. The first Class Sub-Judge, Hyderabad, dismissed the suit on the ground that it could not be brought without the prior leave of the Insolvency Court. The District Judge of Hyderabad, on first appeal, confirmed this decision, also holding that no suit would lie against the Receivers in insolvency without the prior leave of the Insolvency Court. This second appeal has been brought to obtain a reversal of this decision and the trial of the suit on the merits by the lower Courts.

It appears to me that there has in this case been some misapprehension as to the rule regarding prior leave for a suit against a Receiver. There is an old rule of the common law that no suit may be brought against a Receiver appointed in a suit without leave of the Trying Court. But even that rule is limited to a case where the claimant is not in possession of the property and where actual possession has been taken by the Receiver. The rule and the authorities upon which it is based will be found in paragraph 709 of Volume 24 of Halsbury's Laws of England. It is that rule which was apparently applied by the Madras High Court in 1903 in the case of Kamatchi Ammal v. Sundaram Ayyar (1). That also must, no doubt, have been the rule which was referred to in general terms by the single Judge of the Calcutta High Court, who decided the case of Pramatha Nath Gangooly v. Khetra Nath Banerjee (2). But it must be observed that both those cases were cases of Receivers appointed in suits under the Civil Procedure Code. There would appear to be no authority for holding that that rule, which has been applied to Receivers in suits who are merely officers appointed to hold the property on behalf of the Court, has also been applied to Receivers in insolvency or, as they are otherwise termed, Official Assignees in insolvency in whom the property is actually vested under the Insolvency Act. That, no doubt, would explain why no reference whatever was made to the necessity of obtaining the leave of the Court in the case in which it was held that the common law right to sue the Official Assignee was not taken away by the provision enabling a person aggrieved by any act of the Official Assignee to bring the matter before the Insolvency Court. That was the case of Naginal v. Official Assignee (3) decided by the Bench of the Bombay

High Court. But that there is no such rule applicable to Receivers in insolvency or in other words to Official Assignees in insolvency has been expressly stated in the case of Ramalinga Chetty v. Ananthachariar (4) by the Madras High Court. It appears, therefore, to me that there was no necessity in this case to obtain leave before suit under any general rule and the appellant, not being a creditor but being a third person claiming adversely to the insolvents, was not affected by the special provisions of section 16, clause 2 (b), of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907. And though affected by the provisions of section 22 that section contains no special provisions prohibiting the enforcement of rights by suit without the leave of the Court.

We ought, in my opinion, for these reasons to reverse the decisions of the lower Courts and to remand the case for trial upon the merits under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code.

Costs to be costs in the cause.

CROUCH, A. J. C.—Plaintiff is in possession of a house which the Official Receiver in a certain insolvency claims to be a portion of the estate vested in him. The plaintiff has, prima facie, a right of suit under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act to obtain a declaration that she is entitled to such property, unless it can be shown that such right is either expressly or impliedly barred by some rule of law. The view of the lower Court is that such a rule exists. The authority cited is reported as Kamatchi Ammal v. Sundaram Ayyar (1). The theory there put forward is that the Receiver is an officer of the Court and that any party aggrieved by his conduct should seek redress against him in the proceedings in which he was appointed, and that no separate proceedings can be taken against him, either in that Court or elsewhere, without the leave of the Court under whose authority the Receiver was acting. On consulting the authorities upon which the lower Court Judge relied we find that the decision rests ultimately on an English rule of procedure. Now, if any citizen of the Province of Sind desires to know what is the law of insolvency in this province and whether or not his right of suit in any particular case is barred by such law, he is entitled to consult the Provincial Insolvency Act, III of 1907, which was framed for the express purpose of consolidating and amending the law relating to insolvency in British India as administered by Courts having jurisdiction outside the Presidency Towns. Now the only section in this Act which can conceivably limit plaintiff's right of suit is section 22. This section does not expressly bar the suit, and I fully agree with the Judges who decided the case reported as Bai Samrat v. Sardarsang Hamabhai (5) that its terms are not such as to justify the view that the right of suit is impliedly barred. In my opinion it is always dangerous for any Indian Court to apply an English common law rule of procedure, unless such rule has been expressly adopted and the present case offers an instructive illustration of the danger of doing so. The rule relied on seems never to have been limited by strict definition, and both the scope and the limits of its application are open to question.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the right of suit in this case is not barred and I remand the case as suggested by the learned Judicial Commissioner.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—This is an appeal from an order passed under the Succession Certificate Act. It arises under the following circumstances:—The applicant, the appellant before this Court, is the widow of one Umrao Singh. She applied to the District Judge for a certificate entitling her to collect the debts of her late husband, to the amount of Rs. 1,246-11-0. The application was opposed by certain persons, the respondents now before us, who claim to be interested as reversioners in the estate of Umrao Singh. The District Judge decided in favour of the present appellant, but held that the succession certificate should be granted only subject to her furnishing security for the amount of the debts specified in her application. He fixed the amount at Rs. 1,250, and we think it is worthwhile to notice this point, because it would seem that, by some copyist's error, the lady was left under the impression that she was ordered to furnish security to the amount of Rs. 1,750. Some months later the present appellant applied to the District Judge, the successor-in-office of the Judge who had originally passed the order, asking him to grant her a certificate without any condition as to security, the reason alleged being that she was not in a position to furnish security. Thereupon an order was passed on the 8th of December 1915, to the effect that the learned Judge refused to reconsider his predecessor's order. The appeal is against this order of the 8th December 1915.

A preliminary objection is taken before us that no appeal lies and we have come to the conclusion, although not without some reluctance, that this objection must prevail. The question we have to consider is altogether distinct from the question whether an appeal could have been prosecuted by either party against the original order of July the 30th, 1915, granting a certificate subject to conditions. According to the existing state of authorities in this Court, such an appeal would not lie, vide Nannhu Mal v. Gulabo (1) and the cases therein cited. Our attention has been drawn to a later decision of this Court in Gauri Dutt v. Musammatt Maikia (2) questioning the correctness of the older rulings, though not dissenting from them. If the question had come before us in a pure form, namely, whether this lady had or had not a right of appeal from the order of the 30th July 1915, we might have felt disposed to see whether the older decisions of this Court could not be re-considered. The lady, however, has submitted to the existing current of authority in this Court and has refrained from appealing from this order of the 30th July 1915. We must, therefore, accept the position that that order was not appealable, or, at any rate, has not been appealed against. The order of the 8th of December, as it stands, is merely an order rejecting what the learned Judge took to be an application for review of the order of the 30th July 1915. From this order, as it stands, it is quite clear that no appeal lies. The only question, which could be argued and which has been argued before us, was whether we could treat this latter order as being in substance one refusing a certificate in favour of the present appellant. We are afraid under the circumstances stated that it is impossible for us to do this. If the appellant wished to obtain from the District Judge an appealable order, in accordance with the view of the law taken in Nannhu Mal v. Gulabo (1), she should have moved the District Judge, upon her representation that she was unable to furnish security, to pass an order finally disposing of her application for the certificate. Such an order, in the circumstances, if the District Judge had refused to review his predecessor's order, would have to be an order rejecting this lady's application for the certificate, and from such an order, according to the view of the law hitherto accepted in this Court, an appeal would lie. It may be that it is not too late even now for the appellant to adopt this course. For the reasons stated, we dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

WALSH, J.—I agree. I think the whole thing is a lamentable exhibition of the results which may accrue to parties of a misunderstanding and an attempt to fight about the form instead of the substance. The whole point in the case is as to who should collect the debts of the deceased man, and there is no question between the parties, such as arises in a suit, which need have led to several months being spent upon an idle discussion of this kind. There seems to have been a misunderstanding. Mr. Malaviya tells us, and I see no reason to doubt him, that the intention was to get an order from the District Judge on the 8th of December 1915, refusing a certificate without furnishing security. For some reason, which has not hitherto been explained, there was an order on that application which is dated the 4th of May. It is quite clear from the order which was drawn up that the learned Judge treated the application as one to review or modify the previous order. Whether it was that owing to the time which had elapsed when the formal order came to be drawn up what had really happened was forgotten and the formal order does not represent the real result, or whether it was due to the fact that the learned gentleman representing the appellant did not make himself clear to the learned Judge of the Court below, it is impossible for us to say that it is an order refusing a certificate. It is not such an order. It is an order refusing to entertain an application to review or modify the previous order. Therefore we cannot deal with it as something which it is not. It seems to us, however, that there is no obstacle to the applicant, the appellant before us, taking immediate steps to make a fresh application to the District Judge, and if possible supported by an affidavit, for grant of an unconditional certificate, or in the alternative for a certificate on such terms as the Judge thinks right. And if she is advised to appeal against the order made on such fresh application, speaking for myself, if I am satisfied that unless this Court makes some order to accelerate the hearing of the appeal, some of the debts will become statute-barred, I should be prepared to accelerate the appeal to prevent such result. That seems to be required in the interest of

The question whether the whole or part of an alleged defamatory writing would be construed by an ordinary reader to refer to a particular person is a question of fact which, in English Courts, would be left to a Jury, and where the Jury arrives at its verdict on this particular point through a misconstruction of the writing read as a whole or through other circumstances appearing in the case, that verdict is a verdict upon a question of fact. [p. 126, col. 2.]

The questions of justification, fair comment, bona fides and quantum of damages, in an action for defamation, are also all questions of fact. [p. 128, col. 1.]

Though it is a question for the Judge to say whether if certain facts were proved they would amount to justification, yet it is a question for the Jury to say whether an article complained of is a fair comment on a matter of public interest. It is only where the article is so clearly fair that there can be no question of libel on the admitted facts that a Judge may stop the case. [p. 128, cols. 1 & 2.]

The High Court cannot, in second appeal, interfere with a finding on any of the above matters. [p. 127, col. 1.]

The doctrine of penal and exemplary damages is due to an illegitimate encroachment on the considerations of punishment by fine in criminal jurisprudence into realms of civil law and such doctrine should not be introduced into British India. [p. 128, col. 1.]

Second appeals against the decrees of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, in Appeal Suits Nos. 165 and 173 of 1914, preferred against those of the District Munsif, Tanjore, in Original Suit No. 559 of 1912.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. Rangachariar, Messrs. P. R. Ganapathi Aiyar and K. S. Ramabhadra Aiyar, for the Appellant in S. A. No. 835 and for the Respondent in S. A. No. 1349.

Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Respondent in S. A. 835 and for the Appellant in S. A. No. 1349.

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—These two connected appeals arise out of the same suit brought by the plaintiff, a leading Vakil of the Tanjore Bar, for the recovery of Rs. 2,000 for damages for the libel contained in a letter sent to the "Madras Standard" by the defendant and published in that paper on the 22nd August 1912. The letter is marked as Exhibit A in the case. The District Munsif awarded Rs. 500 damages and full costs. Both sides appealed and the learned Subordinate Judge on appeal reduced the damages to Rs. 10 but awarded full costs to the plaintiff in the defendant's appeal and dismissed the plaintiff's appeal without costs. In the defendant's Second Appeal No. 1349 of 1915, Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar argues that only the last eleven lines of Exhibit A were intended by him to refer to the plaintiff, and that even as regards the matter contained in those eleven lines his letter amounts to a fair comment made bona fide upon the plaintiff's conduct as Vakil in putting forward arguments in a particular mode in a case conducted by him and that, therefore, he is not liable, in law, to the plaintiff for such comments.

I think the question whether the whole of a writing or any part of that writing would be construed by an ordinary reader to refer to plaintiff is a question of fact which in English Courts would be left to a Jury, and where the Jury arrives at its verdict on this particular point, through a misconstruction of the writing read as a whole or through other circumstances appearing in the case, that verdict is a verdict upon a question of fact. While, therefore, I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge in arriving at his conclusion that the first portion of the letter, Exhibit A, would not be read by an ordinary newspaper reader as referring to the plaintiff, did so through a construction of the letter which according to legal canons of construction was wholly unjustified, I am unable to hold that his finding as to the implication that would be put by an ordinary newspaper reader on that portion of the letter A (that is, whether it referred to the plaintiff or not), is not a question of fact but one of law and is, therefore, open to be questioned in second appeal.

As regards the remaining portions (that is, the last eleven lines) they clearly accuse Mr. Naganatha Sastri of the six faults, numbered 1 to 6, in the next previous portion and also of sophistry. The defendant in his own evidence admits that Mr. Naganatha Sastri was not guilty, in the conduct of the case, of five of the above seven faults. If, however, an ordinary reader would read the document as charging Mr. Naganatha Sastri with these five faults also, then the defendant is clearly guilty of libel. The defendant's appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

As regards the plaintiff's second appeal, it is valued at Rs. 1,990. I find from the Subordinate Judge's judgment that the plaintiff left the question of the quantum of damages entirely in the hands of that Court. That Court in respect of the defamatory matter contained in the last eleven lines assessed the damages at Rs. 10 and in respect of the whole letter (if the whole was a libel on plaintiff) at Rs. 100. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff's appeal on the question of the inadequacy of damages should have been confined to the difference between the Rs. 100 and the Rs. 10, that is, to Rs. 90. I have already observed, in considering the defendant's appeal, that the question whether the first portion of the letter applied to plaintiff is a question of fact with which I cannot interfere in second appeal. The quantum of damages is also a question of fact. The plaintiff's appeal is, therefore, also dismissed with costs.

In thus confirming the judgment of the Subordinate Judge I should not be understood as affirming all the observations as to the ethics of the profession contained in that judgment. The remark that "members of the profession have no duty to judge of the case for themselves before accepting an engagement", seems to me to be too broadly stated. I think the tendency in modern times is to expect from the legal profession a greater amount of care and conscience in accepting engagements and in putting forward arguments than was thought sufficient in the days of Lord Erskine or Lord Brougham, when the duty of practitioners to clients was exalted to such an extent as to obscure the duty of the practitioner to see that his own delicacy of conscience and sense of right is not gradually blunted and that his position as a promoter of justice and a helper of the Court in its administration is not gradually made subordinate to his position as a mere paid advocate of the claims of others.

I shall notice also very shortly two points referred to by Mr. T. Rangachariar in the course of his argument. He referred to the House of Lords' case in Hulton & Co. v. Jones (1) to support his position that whether the plaintiff was intended or not intended to be attacked, the defendant would be liable if an ordinary reader would reasonably come to that conclusion. Supposing that the English Law as developed by the English precedents is to that effect, I do not see why the Indian Law should follow suit unless the doctrine is in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience. I am strongly of opinion that the dissenting opinion of Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton on the question (an opinion which was expressed in the same case when it was before the Court of Appeal) [see Jones v. Hulton & Co. (2)] is much more in consonance with justice and equity than the law as now settled in England on this point.

The other point mentioned by Mr. T. Rangachariar is that penal and exemplary damages ought to be awarded in such cases as the present. I shall content myself with observing that the whole doctrine of penal and exemplary damages is due to the illegitimate encroachment of the considerations of punishment by fine in criminal jurisprudence into the realms of civil litigation and I wholly deprecate the introduction of such complications of the English system into India. I wish to remark in conclusion that the plaintiff would have been better advised if he had treated the whole matter, even in the beginning, with indifference (I shall not say contempt). At any rate, he should not, in my opinion, have pursued the matter in the Appellate Court after he had obtained a judgment in the First Court, nor have filed a second appeal in this Court after both Courts had decided in his favour that the defendant was not justified in his attacking the plaintiff, though they differed as to whether the whole of the letter or only a portion constituted such attack.

SPENCER, J.—I entirely agree with what has fallen from my learned brother as to the undesirability of this matter having formed the subject of a civil action after the defendant had tendered an apology.

The Subordinate Judge found, as a finding on a question of fact, that only the latter part of the newspaper publication referred to the plaintiff.

It has been argued that as the alleged libel is contained in a document, it is open to us to interpret this document according as we think proper. In my opinion, it is not the legal construction which is to be put on this document that we have to consider but what an ordinary person would understand by the language used, and this is a matter which would be in a case tried with a Jury a question for the Jury to decide. Therefore, whether the first part of the article referred to the plaintiff or not is a question of fact into which we cannot go in second appeal. I am not prepared to say that, if this matter had come before us in first appeal, I should have taken the same view as the Subordinate Judge has taken.

Then as to the questions of justification, fair comment and bona fides these also are questions of fact, and the first Court found them against the defendant in paragraphs 21, 22 and 24 of its judgment and the learned Subordinate Judge agreed with the District Munsif. It has always been held that, although it is a question for the Judge to say whether if certain facts were proved they would amount to justification, yet it is a question for the Jury to say whether an article complained of is a fair comment on a matter of public interest. It is only where the article is so clearly fair that there can be no question of libel on the admitted facts that a Judge may stop the case. We must, therefore, accept the findings as to fair comment and bona fides.

The quantum of damages is also a question of fact, and even were it otherwise, the circumstances of this case do not seem to require any interference.

I, therefore, agree that both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Both appeals dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

WALSH, J.—This is by no means a simple matter, having regard to what has previously happened in the history of the case. The circumstances out of which the suit arises appear in every judgment on the record (I think this is the fifth judgment in the case), and need not be reiterated. When the case was last before my brother Mr. Justice Sunder Lal, as he then was, and myself, certain issues were sent down to the lower Appellate Court. The result of the findings is that the District Judge has held that the plaintiff had no contract with defendant No. 2 and that defendant No. 1 only received notice of a contract, if there was one, during the registration proceedings.

Either of these findings, if they are sound, would be fatal to the plaintiff's case.

The second is clearly untenable. The point is covered by authority, and we have no alternative but to hold that the notice was sufficient to render defendant No. 1 liable under section 27, sub-section (b) of the Specific Relief Act, if there was a contract. The first point raises considerable difficulty. At the first hearing in the first Court defendant No. 2, who is alleged to have made the contract, did not appear to dispute it. It would be idle to ignore that significant fact. The first Court held that there had been an executory contract for Rs. 2,900 and that Rs. 100 had been accepted by defendant No. 2 as part payment thereunder. Defendant No. 1, who succeeded on the question of notice, did not challenge this finding when he was respondent in appeal, but as he again succeeded in the lower Appellate Court on the question of notice, this Court in referring the issues gave him the opportunity to do so at the second hearing.

At the trial of the issues the plaintiff set out to support the formation of the contract, which hitherto had not been seriously disputed, by advancing a good deal of additional evidence tending to show prior negotiations as far back as 1908. The learned District Judge, for reasons we are quite unable to follow, rejected this evidence and has drawn an inference against the plaintiff for having failed to produce it on the former occasion which we think is not justified, as on the former occasion there was no dispute. They are, however, findings of fact which we are by law prohibited from disturbing. It was urged by the appellants that the case of Mubarak Husain v. Bihari (1) was a decision justifying our ignoring the findings. All that that case decided was that where in second appeal issues have been referred, and after they have been decided, the case comes back to this Court and another Judge thinks that the case could have been disposed of and can still be disposed of without reference to the issues which have been referred and which need not have been referred, he is at liberty to decide the case without reference to the issues. That is a totally different thing from overruling the findings on the issues and we must take it to be the law, as decided in Bal Kishen v. Jasoda Kuar (2), that findings on issues referred to a lower Appellate Court in second appeal are just as much findings of fact as the findings in the original suit and cannot be disturbed by this Court in second appeal. These findings, however, do not dispose of the case. The learned Judge treated the case when referred as res integra. In this he was wrong. He entirely ignored, so far as anything in his judgment shows, the evidence and the findings of the first Court to which we have already referred. He has come to a conclusion that there was no contract because he has rejected the evidence of 1908, and because defendant No. 2 did not authorise the sale-deed which was prepared. This was a misdirection in law. It is quite true that we may again refer this part of the case for the facts to be found by the lower Appellate Court. We think, however, that the case has occupied too much time already and that when this Court can it ought, in the interests of the parties, to dispose finally of issues which have been left undetermined by the lower Appellate Court. Exercising our jurisdiction under section 103 we have been taken thoroughly through the evidence upon the record and we are satisfied as a fact that having regard to the evidence in the first Court and to the surrounding circumstances of the case, the plaintiff did agree, and defendant No. 2 agreed with the plaintiff, for the sale of this property for Rs. 2,900 and that Rs. 100 was paid in part payment of the purchase-money.

FATEH BAHADUR KHAN v. JAGRAJ KUNWAR.

The evidence further shows and this point has also been entirely ignored by the learned District Judge, that defendant No. 1 himself, in a suit in which the title to this identical property was in question and when he himself was asserting that defendant No. 2 had been as against his wife the owner, put the present plaintiff into the box and as part of his, defendant No. 1's own case, attempted to prove the very contract which he now denies. In our opinion a person is not permitted to affirm and disaffirm a transaction when it suits his interest so to do, and that being apparently what defendant No. 1 is seeking to do in this case, we hold on this second ground that he is estopped from asserting, as against the parties to this suit, that this contract which he himself relied upon in another suit did not exist in fact. On this ground we hold that the property had already been sold on the 19th of February to the plaintiff when the contract of June was entered into with defendant No. 1, and that the defendant No. 1 had notice of such transaction before the registration of his own contract was completed, and that he is, therefore, liable in this suit to the plaintiff under section 27, sub-section (b), and that the plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to a decree against defendant No. 1 as well as against defendant No. 2 for possession of the property and for an order that the sale-deed of the property in suit be executed by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in favour of the plaintiff. The appellant must have his costs here and in the Courts below, which will include in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), ss. 4 (1), 47 (1)— Landlord and tenant—Ejectment—Tenant, re-admission of, to portion of previous holding—Enhancement of rent, legality of.

Where a tenant after his ejectment from the holding is re-admitted to only a portion of the same at an enhanced rent, the enhancement is illegal if it exceeds by more than one anna in the rupee or $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. the rent payable by him before his ejectment. [p 131, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Rae Bareilly, dated the 18th July 1916, modifying that of the Assistant Collector, 1st Class, Rae Bareilly, dated the 15th May 1916.

The Hon'ble Mr. Samiullah Beg, for the Appellants.

Mr. Brij Bhan Chandar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The decision of this second rent appeal has been referred to a Bench by the order of the Judicial Commissioner, dated the 24th January 1917. The facts are very simple. The defendants-appellants held the land in suit from the plaintiff as agricultural tenants together with 5 bighas 17 biswas and 3 biswansis at a rent of Rs. 89-2-0. On 19th July 1913, the plaintiff gave them a lease of the land in suit only for Rs. 163-4-6 reducing the area of the previous holding by 5 bighas 17 biswas and 3 biswansis. The question for our decision is whether the enhancement of rent thereby provided can be enforced in view of the provisions of sections 4 (1) and 47 (1) of Act XXII of 1886. The effect of an enhancement, other than an enhancement in accordance with the provisions of section 47, is discussed in a Bench case, Rama Nand v. Nadir Ali Khan (1). In a subsequent decision of the Judicial Commissioner sitting alone, Lachhman Singh v. Sarfaraz Kunwar (2), it was decided that where a tenant who had been ejected from his holding was re-admitted to a holding with an increased area on an enhanced rental, section 47 did not apply. This decision does not affect the present case. It is no authority for the converse proposition that section 47 does not apply to a case where a tenant who has been ejected from his holding has been re-admitted to a portion of the same holding. Section 47 (1) states: "Except in the cases mentioned in sections 49 and 50" (these sections have no application to the present case), "the rent of a tenant admitted to the occupation of any land, the tenancy of which has determined according to the provisions of this Act, shall not exceed by more than one anna in the rupee, or six and a quarter per cent., the rent payable by the tenant immediately preceding him." The tenancy of the land in suit had determined according to the provisions of this Act, and the only question for our decision is whether the words "any land" would include a portion of the land in the area of the previous holding. The greater includes the less, and in our opinion the words "any land" must be interpreted as including a portion of the previous holding.

We, therefore, restore the decree of the learned Assistant Collector and set aside the decree of the learned District Judge. The respondent will pay her own costs and those of the appellants in the Court of the District Judge and in this Court.

Decree restored.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Joint family—Ancestral property—Partition, suit for, by son in father's lifetime, whether maintainable—Partition decree—Minor unrepresented in suit, whether bound.

A suit for partition of ancestral property by a Mitakshara son in the lifetime of his father is maintainable. [p. 133, col. 2.]

A minor unrepresented in a partition suit, is, in the absence of prejudice, bound by the partition decree. [p. 134, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Patna.

Messrs. Ganesh Dutta Singh, Sivnandan Roy and Karunamoy Bose, for the Appellant.

Rai Tribhuan Nath Sahay and Mr. Dwarkanath Pathak, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for partition instituted by the plaintiff in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Patna in respect of the properties enumerated in Schedules I, II and III to the plaint. Defendant No. 1 is the father of the plaintiff; defendant No. 2 is the brother of the plaintiff's father; and defendants Nos. 3 and 4 are the adult sons of the plaintiff's father, who have declined to join as plaintiffs in this suit. Defendant No. 5 is the grandson of defendant No. 2.

Paragraph 19 of the plaint, contains prayers for the following reliefs:—

1. That on getting all the properties mentioned in Schedules I, II and III of the plaint partitioned through an Amin Commissioner, the plaintiff's 2-annas out of the 16-annas share may be separated and "khas" possession thereof be delivered to the plaintiff.

2. That the property mentioned in Schedule II may be given to the defendant No. 2 and that in Schedule III to the defendant No. 1 or an additional share in proportion to the price of those properties may be allowed to the plaintiff after including it in the share of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2.

3. That the cost of the suit with interest may be realised from the contesting defendants and awarded to the plaintiff.

4. That such other order as be found proper, may be passed in favour of the plaintiff.

No less than 10 issues were framed by the learned Judge who tried the suit but those material for the purposes of this appeal are issues Nos. 6 and 7. Issue No. 6 runs as follows:—"What are the joint family properties? Has plaintiff omitted to mention in the plaint any of the joint family properties?" And issue No. 7 runs as follows:—"Is the plaintiff in joint possession of the properties in suit with the defendant? If not, does his suit for partition lie?"

The learned Judge found that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the suit during the lifetime of his father. He further found that there was no evidence that the plaintiff's interest in the property in suit was being imperilled. He also found that even if the suit lay, it was incompetent because the property now in suit had been partitioned in a previous suit brought before the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut in the United Provinces. He accordingly dismissed the suit, but without costs. The plaintiff now prefers the present appeal before us.

Now, the first question that arises is whether upon the plaint as it is framed the suit can be said to be a simple suit for partition. On behalf of the respondent it has been strongly urged that unless the plaintiff brings upon the record certain persons into whose possession the properties mentioned in Schedules II and III have passed, he cannot proceed with the partition against the defendants before us. It appears that some of the properties enumerated in Schedule II or a share in these properties have been sold in execution of a decree against defendant No. 2; and that the auction-purchasers have taken possession. These auction-purchasers are not impleaded as defendants in the present suit, and it is contended that unless the plaintiff brings a properly framed suit for the recovery of possession of these properties he cannot ask the Court to proceed with this partition.

It also appears that the properties in Schedule III have been alienated by the plaintiff's father and are now in the possession of third parties.

It is similarly contended that unless these transferees are brought upon the record and the property recovered from their possession the partition cannot proceed.

In my opinion there is considerable force in these contentions. The plaint as it stands is for partition of the properties in Schedules I, II and III; and unless the persons in possession of these properties are impleaded and unless it is decided in their presence that the transfers are invalid or not binding upon the plaintiff, the suit as a suit for partition is clearly incompetent. The plaintiff must bring all the persons in possession of the properties which he seeks to partition before the Court and the Court will then give him the equitable relief which he seeks.

Mr. Pugh on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant recognises this difficulty and suggests that we should allow him to amend the plaint in the following manner:— He requests that clause (1) of paragraph 19 of the plaint should run as follows:—

1. That on getting all the properties mentioned in Schedule I, save that portion of items 5 and 7 of the said schedule which remains unsold, partitioned through an Amin Commissioner the plaintiff's 2-annas out of the 16-annas share may be separated and "khas" possession thereof be delivered to the plaintiff.

He next asks that clause (2) of paragraph 19 may be expunged and the following clause be substituted therefor:—

(2) That an account be taken from defendant No. 1 in respect of that part of the properties which has been sold by defendant No. 1 since the institution of this suit.

It is necessary to explain that item No. 15 was the subject-matter of partition in the Meerut suit, three-fourths of the house which comprised this item falling to the share of the plaintiff's uncle, defendant No. 2, and one-fourth to the share of the plaintiff's father, defendant No. 1. Since the institution of the present suit defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2 have jointly sold the house and the sale-proceeds are now in deposit in a bank. Defendant No. 1 is required by the plaintiff to account for the plaintiff's share in the one-fourth share of the sale-proceeds of the house.

We think that it is competent to the plaintiff in the present suit to take the account he seeks. He is not bound to ask for the partition of the properties which have been alienated. In a partition suit the other members of the joint family are liable to account for any expenditure out of the joint family funds which has been incurred for expenses not legitimate to the purposes of the joint family and if, as the plaintiff alleges, there has been any misappropriation or waste on the part of the defendants, all the defendants are liable to account to the plaintiff for the same. Therefore, it seems to me that the plaint as amended is in order and the plaintiff is competent to prosecute the suit without being required to file the additional Court-fees which he would have been required to file if a prayer for declaration of title and recovery of possession had been added to the plaint. In my opinion the suit as amended is competent and triable as an ordinary partition suit.

The next question is whether or not the suit is at all maintainable during the lifetime of the plaintiff's father. The learned Vakil for the respondent relies upon Rameshwar Prosad Singh v. Lachmi Prosad Singh (1). Their Lordships in that case held that the plaintiff could maintain a suit for partition of ancestral property even when his father and grandfather were both alive, if they allowed the property to be wasted and the plaintiff's interest therein imperilled. Apparently in that case there was evidence of waste and the learned Judge, while holding that the suit was maintainable, decided on the merits that the plaintiff had no right to the property in suit. The learned Judges, however, approved of the judgment of Mr. Justice Telang in Apaji Narhar Kulakarni v. Ramchandra Ravji Kulakarni (2), in which that learned Judge expressed the opinion, without any qualification whatever that a suit by a Mitakshara son for partition was maintainable in the lifetime of both the father and the grandfather. The same view was taken in Subba Ayyar v. Ganasa Ayyar (3). The learned Judges of the Madras High Court in this case made the following observation: "We should have considered ourselves concluded by authority, had it not been for the decision of the majority of the High Court at Bombay in Apaji Narhar Kulakarni v. Ramchandra Ravji Kulakarni (2). After carefully reading the judgments in that case and comparing them with the Mitakshara and the decision in Nagalinga Mudali v. Subbiramaniya Mudali (4), we agree in the opinion of Mr. Justice Telang, who has reviewed at length all the authorities on the subject and dissented from the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the Court." In our opinion the present case is fully covered by this last mentioned authority.

The Calcutta decision upon which the learned Vakil for the respondent relies does not go the full length of his contention; and, in my opinion, that decision does not afford any authority for the proposition that the present suit is not maintainable, if the plaintiff is unable to prove waste or circumstances showing that his interest in the joint family property is being imperilled. The suit, therefore, is maintainable.

Then there remains the question whether the present suit is incompetent by reason of the partition in the Meerut District referred to above. It appears that out of the fifteen items enumerated in Schedule No. I, items Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 15 were covered by the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut which was appealed against to the High Court of Allahabad and although Mr. Pugh at first contended that in spite of the decision of the Appellate Court he was still competent to re-open the partition on the ground that the partition was made in his absence, he does not press this contention very strongly. His argument was that under no circumstances could the plaintiff, who was a minor during the partition proceedings, be bound by a decree in a suit in which his uncle was the plaintiff and his father the principal defendant. Mr. Pugh points out that the defendant No. 1 in that suit set up a claim adverse to that of the plaintiff and raised the plea that the properties were his own self-acquired properties and not the joint family property at all. It is contended that as the interest set up by the defendant in that suit was adverse to the interest of the plaintiff, he would not have been competent to act as guardian ad litem for the plaintiff in that suit and that, therefore, the decision in that suit should not in any way prejudice the plaintiff's suit.

It appears, however, on the authorities that the plaintiff, though a minor and unrepresented, would, in the absence of prejudice, be bound by the partition decree. It has not been shown on the evidence recorded by the learned Subordinate Judge that the plaintiff was in any way prejudiced. It is certainly not necessary that he should have been represented in that suit. The only circumstance which is material is whether or not the results were prejudicial to the plaintiff's interest.

Although the plaintiff's father set up in that suit a plea that the properties were his own self-acquired properties, the Court found that they were in fact joint family property. The partition, as between plaintiff's uncle on the one hand and plaintiff's father representing the plaintiff's branch of the family on the other, appears to have been a fair and equitable partition and is binding upon the plaintiff in the present suit.

Items Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 15, therefore, cannot be partitioned a second time and the present appeal so far as these properties are concerned must be dismissed against defendants Nos. 2 and 5.

With regard to property No. 15, as has already been mentioned, the plaintiff's father has sold his one-fourth share and the money is in deposit in the bank. The plaintiff's share can be easily ascertained and the plaintiff's father will be liable to account to the plaintiff for that portion of the sale-proceeds which represents the plaintiff's share.

With regard to properties Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 5, it is admitted that they were not covered by the partition proceedings in the Meerut District. But then the learned Vakil for the respondents urges that these properties were the subject-matter of a private partition in the year 1883 and that, therefore, the present suit in respect of them cannot proceed.

He relies upon an arbitration award as evidence of the fact that these properties were partitioned by an arbitrator in 1883. Now it appears from the judgment of the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court in 1913, to which reference has already been made, that this arbitration award was considered and the learned Judges came to the conclusion that so far at least as the properties then in suit were concerned, the arbitration award did not touch those properties and that at the time of the partition proceedings at Meerut they were still joint family property and liable to partition, and it is on this basis that the learned Judges allowed the partition to proceed.

It does not appear on a careful perusal of the Appellate Court's judgment that the Court definitely found either that the rest of the property was joint family property or that the alleged partition of 1883 did not take place. We find, therefore, that there is no bar of res judicata as regards items Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 5 in the present suit and the learned Subordinate Judge is in error in holding that these properties were partitioned by the Allahabad High Court and the present suit is on that account incompetent.

It will be a question for determination whether any of these properties are joint family properties or not and that matter will have to be gone into in the course of the remand which we propose to make.

The order, therefore, which we shall make is this. The order and decree of the lower Court will be set aside, and the case will be remanded for trial with the following directions:—

1. It has been represented to us that the mother of the plaintiff is still alive and under the Mitakshara Law she is entitled to a share in the joint family property. The partition cannot and ought not to proceed in her absence and we think it desirable that she should be brought on the record as defendant and that she should be allowed to file a written statement, if she wishes to do so. If out of the pleadings in that written statement any issue arises which is not covered by the issues already framed, a fresh issue or issues will have to be framed and evidence taken thereon. If no other issue is framed upon the written statement of the added defendant, the Court will proceed to try issues Nos. 6 and 7 as already framed by him. The remaining issues will be taken as decided in the plaintiff's favour and no further evidence will be allowed to be given on them.

2. With regard to properties Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 15, Schedule I, the suit is dismissed as against defendants Nos. 2 and 5. But the plaintiff will be entitled to a partition as against the remaining defendants.

3. With regard to the remaining properties of Schedule I, the Court will take evidence on issues Nos 6 and 7 as framed by him and will decide to what portions of these properties the plaintiff is entitled as against all the defendants in the present suit including the added defendant, his mother.

4. Defendant No. 2 will not be liable to account to the plaintiff in respect of properties alleged to have been alienated by him, but defendant No. 1 will account to the plaintiff for that part of items Nos. 5, 7 and 15 of Schedule I and for the whole of Schedule III, which is alleged to have been alienated by the said defendant No. 1.

5. The parties will be entitled to adduce whatever oral and documentary evidence they may consider necessary for the decision of issues Nos. 6 and 7.

6. With regard to the properties in Schedule II the plaintiff, if so advised, must bring a separate suit for recovery of possession before suing for partition. In my opinion he cannot prosecute a suit for partition without first recovering that part of the property which has passed out of the joint family in execution of the decree obtained against defendant No. 2.

As a partial partition has already once been made in respect of this estate by the Allahabad High Court, we think that having regard to the special circumstances that have arisen since that partition we ought to allow the present partition suit to proceed, although incomplete; and we give leave to the plaintiff, if he so desires, to bring a third partition suit in respect of the properties mentioned in Schedule II. The circumstances of this case are exceptional and that is the reason why we allow this course.

The result is that the appeal is decreed in this modified form; each party will bear its own costs.

We direct that the learned Judge will take up and dispose of this matter within four months of the record reaching him.

It appears that there is an injunction in respect of properties Nos. 2 and 4 of Schedule I, prohibiting defendant No. 2 for taking possession thereof. In the view we have taken above the injunction must necessarily be dissolved.

The plaintiff, who had some paddy fields on the lower levels of a tract of paddy land, had for over 20 years openly, peaceably and uninterruptedly caught fish in a trap set on his own land. The defendant set a similar trap by the side of a tank belonging to him, and caught some of the fish which would otherwise have come to the plaintiff's trap, whereupon the latter brought a suit to establish his right of easement and for damages, and for an injunction restraining the former from catching fish in his trap:

Held, that the plaintiff could not acquire an easement by catching fish on his own land and was not entitled to restrain the defendant from catching fish on his own land [p. 136, col. 2.]

water of some paddy land. The plaintiff has some paddy fields on the lower levels of a tract of paddy land and it has been found as a fact that for over 20 years he has openly, peaceably and uninterruptedly caught fish in an arah or trap which he has been setting on his own land. The defendant, it is alleged, set a similar trap by the side of a tank belonging to him and as he caught some of the fish, which would otherwise have come to plaintiff's trap, the latter brought the suit to establish his right of easement and for damages. The Munsif gave him a decree declaring his right to catch fish to be established, giving him Rs. 4 as damages and ordering issue of a permanent injunction restraining the defendant from catching fish in his trap.

The Subordinate Judge on appeal, while finding that plaintiff had been catching fish in his trap for over 20 years, held that plaintiff had no exclusive right to catch all the fish in the tract of paddy land and that the defendant in catching fish on his own land acted within his natural right. He accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

It is now argued on appeal by the plaintiff that on his finding as to user the Subordinate Judge ought to have affirmed the Munsif's decree.

If we examine the facts alleged and the prayers in the plaint, it is quite clear that no question of easement arises at all and that no declaratory decree should have been made. The first prayer runs "that the Court be pleased to establish the plaintiff's right to catch fish which grow spontaneously in the paddy land within the plot specified in Schedule (Kha) and pass with the flowing water, by putting up angti in the place specified in the Schedule (Ga).⁽¹⁾ Now the land in Schedule (Kha) is the plaintiff's land and the place (Ga) is a spot within the plaintiff's land. As it stands, the prayer refers only to fish growing in the plaintiff's own land and passing from it with the flowing water. The case, however, appears to have been dealt with on the footing that the plaintiff claimed the exclusive right to catch fish coming from above, which would in the ordinary course of things come down to his land with the flow of water and it has been argued on that footing before us. The plaintiff would obviously have a right to catch these fish, which are res nullius, while on his land. That right has never been denied by any one and no one is interested to deny it. There was no place then for any declaratory decree. It is also obvious that he could not acquire an easement by catching fish on his own land.

The learned Vakil who appeared for the plaintiff admitted at first that the plaintiff's right in the fish commenced only when they reached the plaintiff's land, but seeing where this admission led to, he subsequently modified it by asserting a right in the fish as soon as the water began to overflow from the land on the higher levels. For this assertion he could show neither principle nor authority, and apart from some supposed virtue in the word "easement," I failed to understand on what principle he argued for a position which leads to this that a man, who has exercised the natural right of catching fish in his own property for upwards of 20 years, thereby acquires the right to prevent everybody else holding land in the vicinity from exercising a similar right.

The case of Ram Dass Surmah v. Sonatun Goohoo (1), which concerned a fishery in a khal, has no application to the case of a man catching fish in the surface water of his own paddy fields.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

PARTY—RESPONDENT.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), s. 39 (d), (g) - Guardian of minor's person, removal of—Marriage of minor - Court, duty of—Muhammadan Law—Puberty, effect of.

It is no part of a Court's duty under the Guardians and Wards Act to assume direct responsibility for the marriage of a minor. But a ward of Court cannot marry without the consent of the Court and if a proposed marriage is unsuitable, the Court may restrain the marriage, even though the guardian has given his consent. [p. 137, col. 2.]

The Court cannot interfere in a case where a minor girl completes her fifteenth year of age and thus becomes competent under the Muhammadan Law to contract a valid marriage with a husband of her own choice. [p. 138, col. 1.]

First appeal from the order of the District Judge, Shahjehanpore, dated the 22nd January 1916.

Mr. S. M. Y. Hasan, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Binod Behari and Iqbal Ahmad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under the Guardians and Wards Act. The appellant before us, Muhammad Fasahat Ullah, is the father's brother of a certain minor girl. The respondent Musammât Tahira Bibi is the mother's mother of the same girl. In a previous proceeding, with which we are not now concerned, the District Judge had appointed Fasahat Ullah to be the guardian of the property and Tahira Bibi to be the guardian of the person of the aforesaid girl. It is evident that these two persons are not on good terms and the record before us shows that the District Court has been frequently asked to adjudicate upon disputes between them. The dispute out of which this appeal has arisen was as to the right of disposing of the hand of this girl in marriage. The position was a somewhat curious one, inasmuch as the paternal uncle has undoubtedly under the Muhammadan Law a preferential right over the mother's mother to dispose of the hand of this girl in marriage, so long as she remains a minor under the Muhammadan Law, that is to say, so long as she neither attains the age of fifteen nor attains puberty. Now Fasahat Ullah applied to the District Judge for two things. He asked him to remove Musammât Tahira Bibi from her position as guardian of the person of the minor; secondly, he asked the Court to order or direct that this girl should be married to a certain person named by him as a suitable bridegroom. The District Judge came to the conclusion that adequate cause for the removal of Tahira Bibi was not shown. He went on apparently to presume that he had sufficient jurisdiction over the person of this minor to pass an order, one way or the other, as to the suitability of any proposed bridegroom. Indeed, curiously enough, this point seems to have been conceded by the parties in the Court below; for Fasahat Ullah had acquiesced in a previous order of the same Court rejecting a bridegroom proposed by him as unsuitable and the form of the application on which the present order has been passed seems to assume the existence of jurisdiction on the part of the Court to which it is made either to grant or refuse it. At any rate the District Judge has come to the conclusion that the proposed bridegroom was unsuitable and that it was not in the interests of the minor that she should be married to him. He accordingly dismissed the whole of the application.

The appeal before us is against the entire order of the District Judge, and it apparently intends to raise both the points decided against the appellant. With regard to the removal of Tahira Bibi from the guardianship over the person of the minor girl, the application for removal has been supported before us on the basis of section 39, clauses (d) and (g) of the Guardians and Wards Act, VIII of 1890. Without going into unnecessary details, it seems sufficient for us to say that we have considered the points pressed upon our notice and that we are not satisfied that sufficient cause has been shown for the removal of this guardian. The question of the respective rights of the parties, and of the rights and duties of the Court, in the matter of the marriage of this minor is a more difficult one. In Lal Singh v. Sham Lal (1) the Punjab Chief Court held that it is no part of a Court's duty under the Guardians and Wards Act to assume direct responsibility for the marriage of a minor. In Monijan Bibi v. District Judge, Birbhum (2) the Calcutta High Court has held that award of Court cannot marry without the consent of the Court and that, if a proposed marriage is unsuitable, the Court, representing the Sovereign power, may restrain the marriage, even though the guardian has given his consent. These two principles are not irreconcilable so far as the case now before us goes. We think that there is no necessity for us to interfere with the order of the District Judge. Since the order was passed the girl in question has completed her fifteenth year of age and is now competent under the Muhammadan Law to contract a valid marriage with a husband of her own choice. As the case now stands, we certainly do not think that it would be right for us to reverse the order of the Court below, in such a manner as to direct that the person of the minor be made over to the appellant in order that he may force upon her a husband of his own choice. The District Judge acted in what appeared to him to be best interests of the minor and we are not satisfied that he made any mistake in the view which he took of what those interests demanded. The result is that as the case stands at present we do not think that any good purpose will be served by allowing this appeal. We dismiss it accordingly with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 3, O. XXXIV, r. 5—Preliminary decree—Part payment out of Court—Adjustment of such payment, whether permissible at final decree.

There is nothing in Order XXXIV, rule 5, of the Civil Procedure Code to justify the view that Order XXIII, rule 3, does not apply to adjustments of accounts made between the date of the preliminary decree and the date on which the accounts between the parties are finally settled.

If a preliminary decree is satisfied in part out of Court, the Court at the final taking of accounts will permit such payment towards the satisfaction of the decree.

Appeal from a decision of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, Muzaffarpur, dated the 1st May 1915.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant in this case is a judgment-debtor against whom a preliminary mortgage decree was obtained on the 18th of September 1911. On the 13th of December 1914 the decree-holders put in a petition to make the decree absolute. The appellants, thereupon, put in a petition to the effect that the decree had been satisfied in part by an arrangement out of Court, this arrangement being that the value of an elephant taken by the decree-holders from the judgment-debtors before the making of the decree absolute should be credited to the accounts to be taken on the mortgage. The lower Court refused to take cognizance of this plea on the ground that it could not be recognized at that stage. Against that decision this appeal is filed.

We are of opinion that the order of the learned Subordinate Judge cannot be supported. It is true that under Order XXXIV, rule 5, it is contemplated that all payments made upon a preliminary decree should be paid into Court. There is nothing in the section to justify the view that Order XXIII, rule 3, does not apply to adjustments of accounts made between the date of preliminary decree and the date on which the accounts between the parties are finally settled. The question of what is actually due upon the mortgage on the date of the final taking of accounts is clearly a matter relating to the suit. We, therefore, direct that the case be remanded to the lower Court for an enquiry into the allegations made in the judgment-debtor's petition and to settle the account upon the result of that enquiry. The respondents will pay the costs of this appeal. Hearing fee three gold mohurs.

An allegation that there is no evidence to support a specific finding of fact is a ground of law; and where such a ground is taken in second appeal, the Court is not justified in summarily dismissing the appeal under the Board's Circular 8-II, rule 19.

Appeal from the decree of the Commissioner, Lucknow, dated the 16th August 1915.

The Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Appellant.

Pandit Suraj Narayan Dikshit, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

HOLMS, S. M.—(July 22, 1916.)—The Commissioner summarily dismissed the appeal without giving notice to the parties, and this he had power to do under rule 19, Board's Circular 8-II. All that he said in his order was that it is clear that no grounds for a second appeal exist. The grounds taken before the Commissioner were four in number. Three of them practically amount to statements that the order of the lower Courts was wrong, but the second ground is to the effect that there is nothing on the record to show that the land in dispute was acquired from the zemindar in lieu of previous rights. That is to say, an allegation was made that there is no evidence to support a specific finding of fact. A ground of this kind is treated as a ground of law and should have been decided by the Commissioner in second appeal.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of the Commissioner and direct that he hear the appeal on the merits. Costs to follow the event.

APPEAL FROM THE CALCUTTA HIGH COURT
December 8, 1916.Present:—The Lord Chancellor (Lord

APPELLANTS
*versus*Raja JYOTI PRASHAD SINGH DEO
AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.Grant, construction of, in England and India—Permanent, heritable and transferable tenure—Mineral rights.

When a grant is made by a zemindar of a tenure at a fixed rent, even though the tenure may be permanent, heritable and transferable, minerals cannot be held to have formed part of the grant in the absence of express evidence to that effect. [p. 142, col. 2.]

A Talabi Brahmattar grant does not, by its mere character, create title to minerals. [p. 141, col. 1; p. 142, col. 1.]

The word 'grant' as used in legal transactions in India is not to be understood in its technical English meaning of a conveyance at common law of remainders, reversions and incorporeal hereditaments which did not lie in livery or of which livery could not be given. [p. 140, col. 2.]

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the Calcutta High Court (Coxe and Teunon, JJ.), dated July 11th, 1911, reported as 12 Ind. Cas. 482, reversing those of the Subordinate Judge, Burdwan, dated the 16th May 1906.

FACTS of the case will appear from the judgment and from 12 Ind. Cas. 482; 38 C. 845.

Mr. A. M. Dunne, for the Appellants.—The gift is a grant or conveyance of the village. The appellants are tenure-holders paying a small rent and their tenure is permanent, heritable and transferable. It is a grant of the land and hence there is no reversion in the zemindar who has only the right to receive the rent. See Sonet Kooer v. Himmud Bahadoor (1). Brahmattar grant is explained in Wilson's Glossary. See also Bengal Regulation I of 1793, preamble sections 1 and 3, and Khagendra Narain Chowdhry v. Matangini Bebi (2). The zemindar was the owner of the minerals and the grant transferred the ownership to the appellants. The grant carries with it also the right to minerals.

SASHI BUSHAN MISRA v. JYOTI PRASHAD SINGH DEO.

Hari Narayan Singh v. Sriram Chakravarti (3) is distinguishable on the ground that there the tenure was not permanent, transferable or heritable. In Durga Prashad Singh v. Brojo Nath Bose (4) the tenure was a service tenure. The question whether the zemindar has any right but to demand and receive rent in the case of these tenures is res integra.

Sir Robert Finlay, K. C., Messrs. L. DeGruyther, K. C., J. M. Parekh and Arfan Ali, for the Respondents.—The appeal is concluded by the decisions in Hari Narayan Singh v. Sriram Chakravarti (3) and Durga Prashad Singh v. Brojo Nath Bose (4). The Privy Council have held in those cases that the right to the minerals still remained in the zemindar unless it was shown that the zemindar had parted with it, even if the tenure was permanent, heritable and transferable. Lord Macnaghten took part in both appeals. This was followed in Kunja Behari Seal v. Raja Durga Prasad Singh (5). A permanent tenure is not a conveyance in fee-simple. The question that a permanent tenure-holder has all the rights of the zemindar is, therefore, not res integra. The relation between the plaintiff and the defendants is one of landlord and tenant. The tenancy may be agricultural or non-agricultural. In any case the right to minerals will not pass to the tenant. See Bengal Tenancy Act, sections 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 18, 19, 20, 65 and 73 and Transfer of Property Act, section 105.

JUDGMENT.

LORD BUCKMASTER, L. C.—The appellants in this case are the descendants and representatives of certain Brahmins to whom, at a date uncertain, but antecedent to 1790, the then Raja of Pachete made a mokurari grant of the village known as Mouzah Panchagachia; the question raised in this appeal is whether this grant carried with it the mineral rights in the soil.

(5) 25 Ind. Cas. 819; 42 C. 346 at p. 349; 20 C. L. J. 304; 19 C. W. N. 203.

In considering the question it is important to avoid giving to words used in connection with legal transactions in India the special and technical meaning that they possess in this country. According to our law, the word "grant" is strictly applicable to the conveyance at common law of remainders, reversions, and incorporeal hereditaments, which do not lie in livery, or of which livery could not be given.

But in connection with the present dispute, the word has no such meaning, and it is important at the outset to bear this in mind.

The grant under which the appellants claim cannot be found, nor is there any copy in existence, nor any record of its literal contents. It is, however, admitted that the grant was a Talabi Brahmattar grant.

Such a grant is defined in Wilson's Glossary as "land granted rent free to Brahmins for their support and that of their descendants, probably as a reward for their sanctity of living or to enable them to devote themselves to religious duties and education."

If after the words "rent free" be added the words "or at a fixed rent," this statement may be accepted as an accurate description of the origin of the grant, but in itself it contains no definition of the characteristics of the tenure. It has, however, been found in the present case that the tenure of the lands in dispute is permanent and heritable, and confers upon the holder for the time being full rights of alienation; but even these findings, though they invest the tenure with attributes of absolute ownership, afford little assistance in determining what it was that the grant passed.

Now, by the Permanent Settlement of 1793, all the mineral rights were confirmed to the zemindars, and the first respondent to this appeal represents their interest in the estate. If such rights were already possessed and recognised at the date of the Settlement, this confirmation would hardly have been needed, and this suggests that up to that date the rights enjoyed and granted in the lands were not considered as including the minerals; if this were so, as the grant in question could have created no rights in the property which the grantor did not possess, no right to the minerals could have been conferred,

SASHI BHUSHAN MISRA v. JYOTI PRASHAD SINGH DEO.

However that may be, there is certainly nothing in the Permanent Settlement to which the appellants can turn in support of their contention. Indeed, apart from the evidence furnished from the Sariskal Jumma, and the facts that have been stated as to the well recognised attributes of a Brahmattar grant, the appellants have been unable to furnish any evidence at all in support of the view that the grant conveyed the minerals; their case really depends upon the assumption that the character of the grant itself is sufficient to establish their claim.

This question has been the subject of much controversy in the Indian Courts, and the appellants can certainly point to some powerful and well-reasoned judgments in support of their view. But in their Lordships' opinion the matter has been set at rest by the decision of the Judicial Committee. In the case of Hari Narayan Singh v. Sriram Chakravarti (3) a question arose as to the ownership of the minerals underlying a certain village called Petena, which had been granted to an idol of whom the Goswamis were the priests. In that case as in this, the grant was not forthcoming, but it was held in the High Court that the tenure of the Goswamis gave them permanent, heritable and transferable rights and, upon this finding, the High Court decided that the minerals had passed under the original gift. Upon appeal to the Privy Council this judgment was questioned upon two grounds. First, that there was no evidence that the tenure carried with it permanent, heritable and transferable rights; and secondly that, even if this contention were wrong, in the absence of express evidence that the creation of the tenure was accompanied with the grant of the minerals, the minerals did not pass. The Judicial Committee decided in favour of the appellant's contention, and the material part of the judgment is to be found on page 145* of the report. The two points are there dealt with, and upon the first Lord Collins, in delivering the judgment of the Board, made this statement:—

"On this meagre foundation of fact the two Judges who constituted the High Court, have built up the theory that the Goswamis were tenure-holders having permanent, heritable and transferable rights."

He then proceeds to deal with the judgment of Mr. Justice Pargiter, who took the view that the creation of such a grant carried with it the mineral rights; and he expresses disagreement with this view of the law, stating that it appeared to ignore the distinction between the mere tenure-holder and the zemindar; the judgment concludes by saying that the zemindar must be presumed to be the owner of the ground rights in the absence of evidence that he ever parted with them. The Counsel for the appellants has strongly urged that the whole of this judgment depends upon their Lordships' refusing to accept the view that the tenure in that case was permanent, transferable and heritable and that the judgment only applies to an estate lacking those qualities. Their Lordships realise that the judgment, in the absence of the argument, might be open to this construction; but, read in the light of the then appellants' contention, they think that the two passages referred to dealt with the two separate points which were raised by the appellants, and that the latter part of the judgment was really independent of the statement which expressed dissatisfaction with the conclusion drawn as to the character of the tenure. Their Lordships would have felt more uncertainty about this view had it not been for a second judgment in a subsequent case, Durga Prashad Singh v. Brojo Nath Bose (4).

In that case also the nature of the grant was not identical with that of the grant in the present case. It was the grant to the holders of an office—the office of Digwar, and it was permanent only in the sense that so long as that office continued to be held by members of the same family, the rights created by the grant would be assured to the holders for the time being of the office. In that case the High Court followed the decision of the High Court in the former case, which had not then been reversed, and Lord Macnaghten, in giving the judgment reversing the High Court, referred to that fact in the following terms:—

"The learned Judges on appeal seem to have been misled by a decision of the High Court in the case of Sriram Chakravarti v. Hari Narain Singh Deo (6), which was afterwards reversed by this Board, and is reported as Hari Narayan Singh v. Sriram Chakravarti (3).

HARI CHARAN KUAR v. KAULA RAI.

There certain persons called Goswanis or Gossains, priests of a Hindu idol to which a certain village had been assigned on a permanent debuttar tenure at a small annual rent, granted a lease of the underlying minerals. The High Court held that the mineral rights were vested in the Gossains. But it was laid down by this Tribunal that 'it must be presumed that the mineral rights remained in the zemindar in the absence of proof that he had parted with them.' "

It is plain from this statement by Lord Macnaghten, who was one of the members of the Board in the former case, that the earlier decision was intended to apply to a permanent debuttar tenure. In other words, that the doubt that was thrown in the former case as to the sufficiency of the evidence on which the tenure had been held to be permanent, heritable and transferable, did not affect the main judgment in the case, which was based upon the hypothesis that these attributes of the tenure had been established.

These decisions, therefore, have laid down a principle, which applies to and concludes the present dispute. They established that when a grant is made by a zemindar of a tenure at a fixed rent, although the tenure may be permanent, heritable and transferable, minerals will not be held to have formed part of the grant in the absence of express evidence to that effect.

It is admitted in the present instance that the only evidence that can be relied on arises from the characteristics of the tenure and the statement as to the object and purpose for which the grant was made as stated in Wilson's Glossary. For reasons that have already been given, this affords no evidence necessary for this purpose, and their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

In conclusion their Lordships' desire once more to call attention to the tedious protraction of Indian litigation. It can only be a misfortune that a dispute, such as the present, which affects a matter so important as the right of mining—a right of great value for the development and prosperity of any country—should have been in abeyance for a period which, from the commencement of the present dispute until the day of hearing of this appeal, has exceeded twelve years.

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, C. J.—The facts of this case as found by the lower Appellate Court are as follows:—

In May 1909 defendants Nos. 1—5, who were at the time the managing members of a joint family consisting of themselves and defendants Nos. 6—13 and 18, agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 13 bighas 12 cottahs of land in a village called Dumri and 2 bighas 5 cottahs of land in a village called Chakki for Rs. 3,500, and in pursuance of that agreement executed two deeds of sale on May 28th and 29th, 1909. Defendants Nos. 1—5 were at that time and had been for some years previously in possession of 3 bighas 15 cottahs of the land in Dumri as mortgagees. On June 20th, 1909, defendants Nos. 1—5 by registered deed sold to defendants Nos. 14 and 15 for Rs. 3,000 9 bighas 10 cottahs of the land in Dumri including the 3 bighas 15 cottahs subject to the mortgage. Defendants Nos. 1—5 having refused to register the deeds executed by them, the plaintiffs brought the present suit for specific performance against defendants Nos. 1—5 and all the members of their family, many of whom are minors. The plaintiffs alleged that defendants Nos. 14 and 15 had taken their sale-deed with full notice of the previous agreement for sale made in favour of the plaintiffs. The lower Appellate Court dismissed the suit on the ground that defendants Nos. 14 and 15 were bona fide purchasers for value without notice of the agreement in favour of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs have appealed. On their behalf it is contended that even if defendants Nos. 14 and 15 had not actual notice, they had constructive notice of the agreement in favour of the plaintiffs inasmuch as they (defendants Nos. 14 and 15) were aware that the plaintiffs were in possession of 3 bighas 15 cottahs of the land and should have made enquiries of them regarding their interest in the land, and if they (defendants Nos. 14 and 15) had made enquiries they would have come to know of the agreement. The defendants contend that a decree should not be made for specific performance, first, because some of the members of the vendor's family are minors and, therefore, the contract lacks mutuality, and secondly, because it is not for the benefit of the minors that the contract with the plaintiffs should be enforced.

These contentions were not put forward in either of the Courts below but they raise questions of law upon the findings of the lower Appellate Court and we think that they should be considered.

The contention that the contract with the plaintiffs should not be specifically enforced rests on the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (1) and Mir Sarwarjan v.

Fakhruddin Mahomed Chowdhuri (2). In the former case it was held that a contract made by an infant is not merely voidable but void. In the latter the manager of the estate of an infant Muhammadan had contracted to buy an estate and it was held that the infant suing by his next friend was not entitled to obtain a decree for specific performance of the contract, inasmuch as the infant was not bound by the contract and, therefore, the contract lacked mutuality. Their Lordships held that it was not within the competence of a manager of a minor's estate or of a guardian of a minor to bind the minor or his estate by a contract for the purchase of immoveable property. It is sought to apply these to a contract for the sale of property made by the managing members of a joint family consisting of themselves and their minor children. There are cases in which specific performance of such a contract has been decreed against the managing members who made the contract, leaving open the question of the validity of the contract as regards the minor members [see Kosuri Ramaraju v. Ivalury Ramalingam (3) and Srinivasa Reddi v. Sivarama Reddi (4)], and there is at least one case in which the contract not being for the benefit of the minors specific performance was decreed against the members who made the contract [see Ponaka Subba Rani Reddy v. Vadamadi Seshachellam Chetty (5)]. The interest of a member of a joint Hindu family in the family property is not individual property at all [see Gharib-ullah v. Khalak Singh (6)]. The manager of such a family is not an agent of the other members nor is he a mere manager. He is much more like a trustee for the other members [see Annamalai Chetty v. Murugasa Chetty (7)]. It is settled law that a father or managing member of a joint Hindu family may under

HARI CHARAN KUAR v. KAULA RAI.

Certain circumstances and subject to certain conditions enter into agreements which may be binding on the minor members of the family [Ganesha Row v. Tulja Ram Row (8)]. I apprehend that the decisions of their Lordships in the cases reported as Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (1) and Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin Mahomed Chowdhuri (2), do not apply to contracts made by the managing member of a joint Hindu family for family necessities or for the benefit of the family, i.e., contracts made by the managing members which bind the minor members of the family. Such contracts can be enforced on behalf of the family by the persons who make them, and I find nothing in the decisions of their Lordships which requires us to hold that such contracts cannot be enforced against the family. Contracts made not by minors but by persons who have power to make contracts on behalf of a joint family do not appear to come within those decisions. I am not prepared to dismiss this suit for specific performance on the ground that the contract lacks mutuality having been made by or on behalf of minors who are not competent to contract.

A long series of English cases has established the rule that if a person purchases and takes a conveyance of an estate which he knows to be in the occupation of another than the vendor, he is bound by all the equities which the person in occupation may have in the land, for possession is prima facie seisin and the purchaser has, therefore, actual notice of a fact by which the property is affected and he is bound to ascertain the truth; and the rule has been applied in England not only to interests connected with the tenancy of the occupier but to interests which he may have under collateral agreements. Thus in Daniels v. Davison (9) the tenant in possession of a public house and garden had entered into a contract for the purchase of the property and a subsequent purchaser was held to have constructive notice of the contract, as he was bound to make enquiry from the tenant which would have led him to a knowledge of it. In that case Lord Eldon said: "My opinion, therefore, considering this as depending upon notice, is, that this tenant, being in possession under a lease with an agreement in his pocket to become the purchaser, those circumstances altogether give him an equity, repelling the claim of a subsequent purchaser, who made no enquiry as to the nature of his possession." The case of Daniels v. Davison (9) has been followed in several cases in India [see Kondiba v. Nana (10) and Sharfudin v. Govind (11) and the cases cited in those rulings]. Assuming that the rule in Daniels v. Davison (9) is applicable to Indian cases, I would point out that notice has been defined in more than one Indian Act in terms which do not go so far as the English cases and that both here and in England it has been repeatedly said by Judges that Daniels v. Davison (9) was an extreme case beyond which the doctrine of notice ought not to be extended, and the case of Penny v. Watts (12) suggests a doubt whether the mere occupation by a person of property would be notice of an agreement not connected with his occupation, though the case was disposed of on other grounds. There appears to be no case in the books in which the Courts have been asked to apply the doctrine of Daniels v. Davison (9) to a case like the one before us, in which the person who had the contract to purchase in his pocket was in possession not of the entire property sold to another, but only of a small portion of that property. The plaintiffs and defendants all live in the same village. The plaintiffs for years before the contract now in question was made had been in possession as mortgagees of a few plots of land belonging to the family of defendants Nos. 1—5. The nature and origin of their possession must have been well known to every one in the village and it seems to me that it would be going too far to hold that the possession of the plaintiffs was under the circumstances sufficient to put defendants Nos. 14 and 15 on enquiry. The plaintiffs' possession was admittedly due not to any agreement to buy that or any other land but to the mortgage held by them. In my opinion it would be a great extension of the doctrine of Daniels v. Davison (9) to hold that in this case defendants Nos. 14 and 15 had constructive notice of the agreement to sell 9 bighas 10 cottahs to the plaintiffs.

It is, however, contended that the doctrine of Daniels v. Davison (9) must be applied at least so far as to fix defendants Nos. 14 and 15 with notice of the agreement with the plaintiffs as regards the 3 bighas 15 cottahs in their possession. Applied in this way the doctrine will not avail the plaintiffs, for we cannot give a decree for specific performance as regards the 3 bighas 15 cottahs only. We have no information as to the respective values of the different plots in question, and it would obviously not be in the interest of the minor members of the family of defendants Nos. 1—5 to decree specific performance of the contract with the plaintiffs as regards some of the plots and leave the sale to defendant Nos. 14 and 15 to stand as regards the 3 bighas 15 cottahs.

Lastly I am of opinion that it is not in the interest of the minor members of the family of defendants Nos. 1—5 that specific performance should be decreed at all. The District Judge has found, and his finding appears to be correct, that the sale to defendants Nos. 14 and 15 is more beneficial to the minor members of the vendors' family than the sale to the plaintiffs would be.

I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 44—Joint family—Alienation—Suit by minor member to declare alienation invalid—Limitation.

Article 44 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act has no application to a suit by a minor member of a joint undivided Hindu family on attainment of majority to declare that an alienation made by his natural guardian is not valid and is not binding upon him.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ganjam at Berhampore, in Appeal Suits Nos. 456 and 467 of 1913, preferred against that of the District Munsif, Sompeta, in Original Suit No. 647 of 1912.

Mr. P. Nagabhushanam, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. V. L. Narasimham, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The lower Appellate Court has decided the appeal on the single ground that the suit is barred by Article 44 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act, which runs as follows:—"By a ward who has attained majority, to set aside a transfer of property by his guardian." It has been held by the Privy Council in Gharib-ullah v. Khalak Singh (1) that there cannot be a guardian of a minor's interest in an undivided Hindu family, for the simple reason that such an interest is not individual property at all. Mr. Narasimham argues that this ruling only applies to the appointment of a guardian by a Court. But the reason applies with equal force to the case of a person claiming guardianship by natural right. Applying this rule we must hold that the sale of the minor plaintiff's property by J. Panda under Exhibit I was not the act of a guardian of property, whatever it purported to be: and following Kathaperumal Thevan v. Ramalinga Thevan (2), that Article 44 has no application to the present suit for a declaration that the sale is not binding. It is not shown that the suit is barred under any other Article. And we must, therefore, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and remand the appeal for disposal on the merits.

The principle of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act is applicable as much to involuntary sales in execution proceedings as to sales effected by act of parties during the pendency of a suit relating to the property sold. [p. 148, col. 1.]

Where certain property is sold in execution, pending the result of an appeal which an unsuccessful third party is prosecuting, asserting his title to the property proclaimed for sale, the doctrine of lis pendens applies to the execution sale, and the title acquired by the auction-purchaser is subject to the result of the said appeal, although the auction-purchaser is no party to it. JUDGMENT.

KANHAIYA LAL, A. J. C.—The facts of this case are sufficiently stated in my order of the 1st September 1916, remanding certain issues for decision to the lower Appellate Court.* The finding of that Court on one

"The dispute in these appeals arises out of the sales of certain shares in four villages in execution of two different decrees. In execution of a decree held by the Secretary of State for India in Council against Sripat Sahai, the former brought to sale on the 20th November 1909 the right, title and interest of Sripat Sahai in a one-anna share of the villages Gaura and Gopalpur and in an eight-pies share of the villages Mahmudpur and Narainpur, with the reservation of the rights held by Dina Nath and Sankata Prasad, the sons of the judgment-debtor, therein. The purchase was made by Ganga Prasad, the father of the plaintiff-respondent. Subsequently a two-thirds share in the same property was sold in execution of a decree for money, held by Gobind Prasad, against Sripat Sahai which had been declared to be binding on Sankata Prasad and Dina Nath. The latter sale took place on the 20th May 1911. The shares in two of the villages were purchased by Mahesh Prasad and the shares in the other two by Satgur Dayal. Meanwhile a suit was filed by Ganga Prasad, the prior purchaser, against Gobind Prasad, the attaching decree-holder, in which Ganga Prasad sought a declaration that Gobind Prasad had included in his attachment a 2-pies 16-krants share in the said villages, which had already been purchased by him in execution of the decree of the Secretary of State for India in Council against Sripat Sahai in 1909. The result of that litigation was that Sripat Sahai was found to be the owner of a 4-pies share by inheritance from one of his collateral relatives name Kanhaiya Lal and of a one-third share of the remainder as a member of a joint Hindu family comprising himself and his two sons, and the sons of Sripat Sahai were declared to be the owners of the remaining two-thirds. In other words, the right of Gobind Prasad to attach and bring to sale the interest of the judgment-debtor was declared to be confined to the latter. The sale took place during the pendency of the above litigation, but the auction-purchasers were not made parties to the same.

"There are two important points, arising for consideration in these appeals. The first is whether Sripat Sahai was the owner of a 4-pies share in each of the 4 villages by inheritance from Kanhaiya Lal to the exclusion of his sons; and the second is whether a bona fide transferee for value, such as Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal claim themselves to be, can be bound by the result of the litigation to which they were not made parties. On behalf of the plaintiff-respondent it was denied that Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal were bona fide transferees. The finding of the Court of first instance was that they were not bona fide transferees, but no opinion was expressed on that point by the lower Appellate Court. That point may also, therefore, have to be considered, in case the

of the issues is that Sankata Prasad and Dina Nath were entitled to a two-thirds share in the property in dispute and that Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal purchased the said two-thirds share in execution of a decree obtained by Gobind Prasad against Sripat Sahai, their father. The decree aforesaid had been declared in a separate suit to be binding on the sons of Sripat Sahai. The one-third share of Sripat Sahai had been previously purchased by Ganga Prasad in execution of a decree, and the lower Appellate Court finds that Mahesh Prasad had notice of that purchase. These findings cannot, however, vary the result of the case, because it is admitted that the purchase of Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal was made during the pendency of the suit instituted by Ganga Prasad, in which he had sought a declaration that Gobind Prasad had no right to bring to sale anything more than the two-thirds share of the sons of Sripat Sahai out of the three-fourths share belonging to the family, his contention being determination of the other points renders its decision necessary. None of the Courts below expressed any opinion on the first point above mentioned, and it seems desirable, before the questions of law arising in the case are discussed, that the questions of fact should be definitely determined one way or the other, for a case in which a Court sells something more than the interest of a judgment-debtor may be capable of differentiation from one in which the Court sells what was owned by the judgment-debtor but which was claimed by him for some reason or another to be not saleable.

"The lower Appellate Court is, therefore, directed to determine on the evidence adduced —

"(1) Whether Sripat Sahai was the owner of a 4-pies share in the disputed villages by inheritance from Kanhaiya Lal and was that share his separate property on the date of the auction sale in favour of Ganga Prasad.

"(2) Whether Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal had at the time of their purchases any notice either of the purchase made by Ganga Prasad or of the claim brought by him for a declaration of his title, and if so, whether they can be regarded as bona fide transferees for value.

"Two months' time will be allowed for a return of the findings and ten days from the date of the findings will be allowed to the parties for filing objections.

that the remaining one-fourth was the self-acquired property of Sripat Sahai. The suit of Ganga Prasad was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge of Fyzabad on the 21st March 1911. Gobind Prasad thereupon proceeded with the sale of the property attached by him in execution of his decree against Sripat Sahai, and brought a two-thirds share to sale on the 20th May 1911 without excluding the portion which was asserted by Ganga Prasad to have been the self-acquired property of Sripat Sahai. Mahesh Prasad and Satgur Dayal purchased the said property at the above sale. On the 24th May 1911 Ganga Prasad succeeded in his appeal, with the result that only two-thirds of three-fourths was declared to be liable to sale in execution of the decree of Gobind Prasad. The auction-purchasers were not made parties to this appeal and the question for consideration is whether they were bound by the result of that litigation.

In Sukhdeo Prasad v. Jamna (1), where certain property was sold pending the result of an appeal which a third party was prosecuting, asserting his title to the property proclaimed for sale, it was held that the doctrine of lis pendens applied to the execution sale and that the title acquired by the auction-purchaser was subject to the result of the appeal brought by such third person. In Radhamadhub Holdar v. Monohur Mukerji (2), where certain property was sold in execution of a decree pending a suit brought by another person to enforce his charge against the property, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that if the judgment-debtor had herself remained the owner of the proprietary interest, she would have been clearly excluded by the sale, held in execution of the decree obtained to enforce the charge, from all interest in the property, and if the judgment-debtor could be so excluded it was equally clear that the auction-purchaser who had purchased during the pendency of the suit to enforce the charge would also be bound by the result of that suit. In Moti Lal v. Karrabuldin (3) a purchase similarly made during the pendency of another suit was held subject to the result of that suit.

The principle of section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act is applicable as much to involuntary sales in execution proceedings as to sales effected by the act of parties during the pendency of a suit relating to that property. The learned Counsel for the defendant-appellant relies on the decisions in Rewa Mahton v. Ram Kishen Singh (4) and Zain-ul-abdin Khan v. Muhammad Asghar Ali Khan (5). But in those cases the judgment-debtor was objecting to the sale of the property on certain grounds which did not affect his saleable interest therein, and the view taken by their Lordships of the Privy Council was that a sale effected in execution of a decree was binding on the judgment-debtor, even though the execution may have afterwards been found to have been improper, because the rights of an auction-purchaser cannot be prejudicially affected if the decree in execution of which the sale was ordered was on the date of the sale a good and subsisting decree.

This rule is not, however, applicable where the person affected was not the judgment-debtor himself but was a third party, who was setting up his own right to the property and was proceeding against the decree-holder by a suit to assert that right. Qua the judgment-debtor, the Court has jurisdiction to sell the property, because the decree, so long as it subsists, gives it the authority to do so; but as against third parties, the Court has no jurisdiction to sell the property, if it is found that it does not belong to the judgment-debtor. The circumstances in which the case of Shivlal Bhagvan v. Shamthuprasad (6) was decided were also different. There certain minors, who were parties to the decree of the Court of first instance but were contesting its validity in appeal, were held bound by a sale effected during the pendency of the appeal, because the appeal in which they were contesting the validity of the decree arose out of the very suit in which the sale was held. The sale was accordingly held to be a good sale as against the parties to the decree on the date on which it was effected so as not to affect the rights of a bona fide purchaser for value. In Nuzhat-ud-Daula Abbas Husain Khan v. Dilband Begam (7), the objection similarly related to the saleable character of the property and was raised by the judgment debtor herself. The circumstances of the present case are somewhat similar to those of Sohan Lal v. Jot Singh (8), where it was held that the rule of lis pendens applied to purchasers at execution sales in the same way as other transferees, and it was not open to such auction-purchasers to question decrees passed in a litigation which was pending in regard to the property on the date of their purchase, though they were no parties to the decree.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Mr. Strangman (with him Mr. Kanga), for the Appellant.

Mr. Desai (with him Mr. Setalvad), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs are up-country cotton merchants who consign cotton to Bombay for sale. Damji Hirji & Co. were, until the 29th of September 1913, their usual consignees and agents for sale in Bombay.

The plaintiffs, as the correspondence shows, frequently called upon Damji Hirji & Co. to remit money to them in large sums, the security being the plaintiffs' cotton in their hands.

Damji Hirji & Co. used to raise money by pledge of this cotton to the 3rd defendants' firm.

On the 29th of September 1913, the 3rd defendants or persons claiming under them held 757 bales of the plaintiffs' cotton against which advances had been made to Damji Hirji & Co.

The accounts between the plaintiffs and Damji Hirji & Co. at that time showed a balance of Rs. 50,000 owing to Damji Hirji & Co., but on the other hand Damji Hirji & Co. had to account to the plaintiffs for the 757 bales.

The 3rd defendants' advance against these bales amounted to Rs. 83,000 or thereabouts.

The contest in this suit is for the amount by which the 3rd defendants' advances exceed the sum due in account by the plaintiffs to Damji Hirji & Co. The learned Judge in the trial Court held that the plaintiffs' representatives knew that the firm of Damji Hirji & Co. were raising money on their goods by pledging them to the defendants who in turn pledged them with the Allahabad Bank, and that the case fell clearly within section 178 of the Indian Contract Act as a valid pledging of goods in the possession of a mercantile agent.

The argument for the appellants is this: section 179 takes the case of a pledgor with an interest in the subject of the pledge out of the operation of section 178 and limits the authority to pledge to the extent of the interest in the goods. Damji Hirji & Co. had a lien on the cotton consigned to them to the extent of Rs. 50,000 or thereabouts in which the accounts showed the plaintiffs to be indebted to them. Therefore, they had no authority to charge the cotton beyond Rs. 50,000. The plaintiffs' Counsel has with this premiss attempted to show that the evidence only shows a recognition by the plaintiffs of Damji Hirji and Company's authority to pledge the cotton to recoup themselves the advances, ex hypothesi Rs. 50,000, already made to the plaintiffs.

In my opinion the proposition of law upon which the argument is based cannot be maintained. Section 179 does not limit the scope of section 178 but saves a pledge to the extent of the pledgor's own interest, notwithstanding the presence of invalidating conditions falling under one of the provisos to section 178. In other words, whenever he has an interest the person in possession of the goods or documents has unconditional authority to charge at least that interest.

Upon the evidence the learned Judge was right. It justifies the finding that the plaintiffs' representatives knew the manner in which their cotton was being dealt with by Damji Hirji & Co., and made no objection and that consequently they approved of the pledging. The correspondence further justifies the conclusion that the plaintiffs urged Damji Hirji & Co. to pledge their cotton, when necessary.

In this state of the evidence it is hopeless for the plaintiffs' Counsel to contend that the circumstances raised any presumption that the pledgor was acting improperly, even though his account shows that he knew the plaintiffs to be the owners of the cotton. It is unnecessary in this view of the case to consider the evidence as to the alleged interview between Meghji

Musammal RAMBATI KUER—PLAINTIFF—

RESPONDENT.

Hindu Law—Widow, compromise of suit by, whether binding on reversioners—Adoption, suit to set aside, by reversioners in lifetime of widow, whether maintainable.

A Hindu widow has power to compromise a suit so as to bind all the reversioners, provided the compromise is for the benefit of the whole family. [p. 151, col. 1.]

Where out of collusion or connivance a widow fails to have an adoption set aside, the next reversioners have a right to have it set aside or declared invalid during her lifetime. [p. 155, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Durbhanga.

Mr. Ganesh Dut Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

ROE, J.—One Singhesar Prasad Singh died in Jeth 1314, leaving him surviving his two daughters the plaintiffs in this case and a nephew Sundar Prasad Singh the principal defendant.

Upon the death of Singhesar Prasad his widow applied for the registration of her name in Register D. The application for registration was resisted by Sundar Prasad Singh upon the ground that he had been adopted by Singhesar Prasad during his lifetime as his son and had been in possession of the property since the death of Singhesar Prasad Singh. The objection was disallowed and the name of Musammal Makund Koer was registered. Sundar Prasad Singh thereupon instituted a suit in the Civil Court for a declaration that he was the adopted son of Singhesar Prasad and for possession of the estate of Singhesar Prasad as the adopted son. The case came to a hearing. Musammal Makund Kuer made default in the production of witnesses and asked for an adjournment of the case. On the adjournment being refused the Pleader left the Court. The case was then decided against her upon formal evidence of the adoption. The case went in appeal to the High Court, and it was there ordered that inasmuch as the learned Subordinate Judge had failed to take sufficient evidence to prove the adoption before the granting of the ex parte decree the case must be remanded to him for a re-hearing, and it was further ordered that at the re-hearing the defendant should be permitted to adduce such evidence as she pleased and to defend the suit generally. On the case returning to the Civil Court for trial a petition of compromise was filed on behalf of Makund Kuer, whereby it was agreed that the adoption should be admitted and that Makund Koer should hold a life-estate in one half of the property, that this half of the property should descend to her daughters upon her death, and that the remaining half should go to Sundar Prasad Singh. In compliance with the decree made upon this petition of compromise Sundar Prasad entered into possession of the half share of the estate. In the meantime the elder girl Rambati Kuer had been married. Her father-in-law Harkhit Singh doubted the binding character of the compromise and suspected the genuine character of the alleged adoption. On his advice a suit was instituted by Rambati Kuer for herself and as next friend of her minor sister for declarations, firstly, that the compromise entered into by Makund Koer is not binding upon the daughters, secondly, that Sundar Prasad was never adopted by Singhesar Prasad Singh.

Upon the pleadings seven issues were framed. They may be briefly summarised as follows:—

Firstly. Can the plaintiffs re-open the question of the adoption in the face of the compromise?

Secondly. If the question can be re-opened at all, can the plaintiffs whose right to succeed was at the time of the death of Singhesar Prasad postponed to the death of a prior reversioner, maintain a suit of this character, and

Thirdly. If they are entitled to maintain a suit for a declaration that the adoption was never made, are they entitled to that declaration upon the merits of the case?

The power of a widow to compromise a suit for the benefit of the whole family has never been doubted. The latest case upon the subject is that reported as Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (1). In the arguments of Mr. Cowell and Mr. DeGruyther will be found a full statement of the case-law upon subject. If it were necessary to lay down any broad proposition to be evolved from these cases, I would say that the position must always be regarded from the point of view whether the widow in making the arrangement was in good faith considering the interests of all the members of the family. If she was honestly doing her best for the family, the compromise entered into by her should be accepted as binding. If she was merely considering her own peace for the remainder of her life, the compromise should not be held binding on those whose interests have not been considered.

The first point to which, therefore, I propose to devote my attention is the question whether it would appear from the papers upon the record that the widow was honestly doing her best for the family as a whole. And in considering this question, inasmuch as a pardanashin widow is not generally possessed of sound wisdom, we should consider carefully to what extent she had access to capable legal advice and whether that legal advice was given her in good faith for the benefit of the estate.

I entirely agree with Mr. Das that the point to be considered in connection with this issue is not whether in fact there was an adoption. The sole question is whether Sundar Prasad was likely to be able to prove that there was an adoption. If there really had been no adoption, nevertheless if there was at the time a conspiracy among the whole of the gotias backed by the neighbouring mahants and the family priest, however great may have been falsity of the case, the danger to the estate was not lessened by that falsity.

We have, therefore, three points to consider firstly, whether there was a menace to the widows's estate; secondly, what was the extent of that menace, and thirdly, was she really acting for the benefit of her daughters in avoiding that menace?

Upon the first point we must go back to the evidence of the defendant Sundar Prasad given as objector in the registration case. He gives in this evidence a list of seven names, six of whom are gotias and one the family priest, as persons who were present at the time of the adoption. We may take it then that these persons were all on his side. It is to be noted that the name of the mahant who now comes forward as a witness is not given among those described originally as having been present at the adoption. It is also to be noted that, if the judgment of the learned Deputy Collector contains an exhaustive review of the evidence, two only of the gotias appeared in the witness-box to give evidence. It is further to be noted that those gentlemen (however many they may have been) who appeared in the witness-box to give evidence on behalf of Sundar Prasad, were characterised by the learned Deputy Collector as perjurers, and the plaintiff's case as a whole was characterised in the following language:—

"I cannot conclude my judgment without recording my strong disapproval of the objector's conduct in relation to his case. He has perjured himself shamelessly and has set up others to give false evidence on his behalf."

Now I do not propose to consider these quotations from the judgment as in any degree res judicata, or anything indicating what was the real position in regard to the adoption. Whatever the learned Deputy Collector chose to say about those witnesses, it would be still open before us for Sundar Prasad to say that the Deputy Collector was entirely mistaken; that the case was a case brought in absolutely good faith and that the adoption had in fact taken place. But the parties, when considering the expediency of a compromise, would naturally consider the impression which the evidence adduced by Sundar Prasad had upon the Court before which it was produced. Had the lady been properly advised she would have been informed that whatever may be the future danger before the learned Subordinate Judge, the evidence given in connection with the adoption had been stigmatised, by the only officer who had yet heard it, as shamelessly false.

We come next to the position in the High Court. Nothing there was said upon the merits of the case. All that had been said was that the evidence on the record in the ex parte proceedings was not sufficient to prove the case. That for the time being was without doubt a victory for Makund Kuer. It seems to me improbable that after these victories in the Revenue Court and in the High Court she would have been advised by her legal advisers to make a compromise, unless there was something more to fear than so far had been made visible.

Coming next to the actual advice she received, we find it admitted that she was throughout these proceedings and up to the date of the remand by the High Court advised by four of the leading Pleaders of the Bar. The compromise was drafted by a mukhtear. That mukhtear had in many previous revenue cases acted on behalf of Sundar Prasad. He did not take the petition of compromise to any of the Pleaders who had been employed on the lady's behalf but chose as the hand by which the compromise should be laid before the Court Babu Bindeshwari Prasad, a young gentleman of two or three years' practice at the Bar. But it may be said that if the lady herself had sufficient intelligence to estimate the danger to the estate her acceptance of the compromise should bind the estate. Here we have to go into the question as to what was the mental capacity of the lady. The plaintiff now strenuously contends that she is full of mental vigour and quite capable of managing her own affairs. Throughout the dakhil kharij case the whole basis of the desire in the mind of Singhesar Prasad to adopt Sundar Prasad was said to be that the lady was practically insane. The mukhtear, in addition to being a mukhtear generally employed by Sundar Prasad, also appears to have got into serious trouble with a factory, by whom he was employed. He had been threatened with criminal proceedings for criminal misappropriation and the sum which he was accused of taking he refunded on the return from Europe of the Manager. In a case in which he offered himself as security either under section 107 or 109 (the section is not mentioned) for Rs. 200 the Police reported that he was not worth that sum. The position, as I see it, is that the compromise was entered into by a parda-nashin widow who according to the case of both sides was half-witted; that the compromise was drafted by a mukhtear with a tarnished reputation who was a tool of her adversary; that this mukhtear deliberately kept the widow away from any legal advice which might have been of benefit to her; and that no responsible lawyer would have advised her that the compromise was a sound compromise. I cannot conceive that a compromise entered into in these circumstances should be accepted as binding upon two children who were not represented. I am of opinion that so far as the two children are concerned, the compromise should be ignored. The children should be allowed now to re-open the question of the adoption in a suit of their own.

The next point for consideration is whether seeing that the adoption alleged is an adoption by Singhesar Prasad and seeing that that adoption bars for the present only the claim of the first reversioner the widow, the second reversioners the daughters can contest the adoption during the widow's lifetime. On consideration of the attitude of the Courts of Bombay and Madras towards suits brought to deny an adoption as exemplified in Barot Naran v. Barot Jesang (2), Ratnamasari v. Akilandammal (3) and in particular in regard to the attitude of Moore, J., in the latter case, I feel that parties likely to be injured by the alleged adoption should be allowed to take the earliest opportunity of denying it. Moreover, it is to be noted that the ceremony of adoption is one of which no written record is made. The evidence of it is oral evidence, and will be lost if its production is too long delayed. It may be that this insane woman may live another 30 or 40 years. If the inheritance is not to be opened for 40 years, it would be then absolutely impossible to prove or disprove an adoption. That this view is the view taken in the English Courts is apparent from the Court's attitude in the Slingsby case a suit for a declaration that a son had been born to the present owner of the Slingsby Estates. If such a suit is maintainable I can see no bar to a suit for a declaration that a son has not been born, or for a declaration that no son has been adopted. The plaintiffs should not be debarred from bringing that suit by the fact that their mother is still alive. That lady has placed herself, either through her own stupidity or through the fraud of Sundar Prasad, in a position from which she would find it difficult to maintain a suit of her own. I hold that it is open to the plaintiffs to go into the question whether there was or was not an actual adoption of Sundar Prasad by Singhesar Prasad.

On this question the learned Subordinate Judge heard the evidence and decided in very forcible language that there was nothing whatever in the case of Sundar Prasad. His judgment is perhaps to some extent vitiated by the extremely minute criticisms on small discrepancies in the evidence, but in view of certain broad facts I am of opinion that his opinion of the value of the evidence given should be accepted. One of the most important things to consider is the motive which might have actuated Singhesar Prasad to adopt at all.

Before the Land Registration Court and before the lower Court Sundar Prasad's case was that Singhesar Prasad was 55 years of age at the time of the adoption and his wife 35 and that her eldest child was born when she was 28. But from the evidence given in the present case, it appears clear that Singhesar Prasad was in the prime of life at the time of his death. There was no reason to fear that his wife would not continue to bear children. In these circumstances the adoption itself seems to be an improbability. Next we have to consider what happened at the moment of Singhesar's death. If Sundar Prasad was indeed the adopted son, adopted with the consent of Singhesar's wife, there could be no reason why he should not forthwith assert that title. Yet when in order to defray the expenses of the sradh of Singhesar Prasad he needed money, Sundar Prasad executed a hand note in which he described himself not as the adopted son of Singhesar Prasad but as his nephew. It does not appear that he took possession of the property, but the evidence upon that point is hopelessly meagre. The only witness called on Sundar Prasad's behalf is Pariag Choudhury, who says that he paid rent to Sundar Prasad from the date of the adoption but is unable to produce any receipts to show that he did so. It seems to me clear that the adoption was not set up until after the lady had applied for registration and if indeed there had been an adoption recognised by all the members of the family, I think we should have found that the first in the field to claim registration would have been the adopted son and not the widow.

Upon all these considerations the learned Subordinate Judge was clearly right in regarding the evidence in support of the adoption with some suspicion. Upon examining that evidence we find that in the dakhil kharij case Sundar Prasad gave the names of seven persons as having been present at the adoption. The only one of these persons now called is Bhatu Misser. Ambica Pershad, Mahant Ganesh Das and the gotia Nemoo Narayan Singh, who claim now to have been witnesses to the adoption, were not mentioned as witnesses in the registration case. The three witnesses who were called in the registration case and also in the present case are the plaintiff himself, his priest Bhatu Misser and his p tvari Ramdhani Lal. This Ramdhani borrowed money on Sundar Prasad's behalf at the time of the sradh and described him as Singhesar's nephew. In the midst of the litigation with the widow this Ramdhani wrote out another hand-note upon which Sundar Prasad, now described as the adopted son, pretended to borrow money for the marriage ceremony of the plaintiff Rambati Kuer. This document was obviously created for use as evidence in Sundar Prasad's favour. It was Ramdhani also who wrote up accounts of the property. These accounts appear to me to be fabricated evidence of possession from the year 1314. The evidence of all the witnesses is upon one point absolutely inconsistent with the story told in the former case. In the former case, it was alleged that the lady Makund Kuer was not present at any stage of the adoption. The explanation given of her absence was that she was too feeble in intellect to attend the ceremony. In the present case it is alleged that she is perfectly sane and that she was present at the adoption and that the defendant after being adopted made pranam to her. Witnesses capable of changing the story in this manner were also capable of inventing the story in its entirety. I agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the evidence on the record not only does not show that there was ever any adoption but also leads to the certain conclusion that there was none. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to the decree made by the learned Subordinate Judge, namely, that it be declared that the compromise entered into by Makund Kuer is not binding upon them and that it be declared that the allegations made by Sundar Prasad Singh that he is the adopted son of Singhesar Prasad Singh are false allegations. This decision will not affect the position of the co-defendants Makund Kuer and Sundar Prasad. There has been no contest as between them upon this question. Makund Kuer has not herself contested the compromise into which she entered and subject to any other proceedings that may be brought, she will remain in possession of the half share of the estate during her lifetime and Sundar Prasad Singh will remain in possession of the other half share until her death.

The appellants will pay the costs of this appeal.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—This is an appeal by defendant No. 1 Sundar Singh. He is a distant nephew of one Singhesar Prasad Singh. The plaintiffs are daughters of Singhesar Prasad Singh, and defendant No. 2 is his widow. Singhesar died in Jeth 1314. Upon his death a dispute arose between defendant No. 2 his widow and defendant No. 1 as to the succession to the property left by Singhesar.

The appellant asserted that he was adopted by Singhesar as his son about a year before his death. His claim was refused by the Land Registration Deputy Collector and the defendant No. 1 was registered in the Collectorate in respect of the property left by her husband Singhesar. The appellant thereupon brought a suit in the Civil Court against defendant No. 1 for declaration that he was the adopted son of Singhesar and for recovery of possession. That suit was finally settled between defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2. A compromise petition was filed by the widow which was assented to by the appellant. By this compromise the widow admitted that the appellant was the adopted son of Singhesar and gave half the property left by Singhesar to him and retained to herself the other half which after her death would pass to her daughters the plaintiffs. On November 30th, 1910, the suit was decreed in terms of the aforesaid compromise petition.

The plaintiffs as reversioners of the estate of Singhesar have brought this action for a declaration that the appellant is not the adopted son of Singhesar Singh and that the compromise entered into by her is fraudulent, collusive and without any right, and that it is not operative and binding upon the plaintiffs after the death of defendant No. 2. The Subordinate Judge, who tried the suit, has decreed the suit and has awarded to the plaintiffs the above declarations sought by them. It is contended in appeal before us that the plaintiffs as remote reversioners have no tangible right in the estate during the lifetime of the widow and hence are not entitled under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, so long as the widow is alive, to a declaration that the adoption did not take place.

The adoption is alleged to have been made by the husband of the widow and in case it were true, the widow will lose her right to retain possession of the estate as heir to her husband. She has prima facie the best right to contest the adoption in her own interests as well as those of the reversioners. But the plaintiffs have been able to show that she in collusion with the appellant entered into a fraudulent compromise admitting his adoption and so failed in her duty to protect the interests of the reversioners. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to seek in Court the protection of their reversionary interest which is so seriously menaced by the false adoption set up by the appellant and acquiesced in and acknowledged by the widow. It is settled law that in case of collusion and connivance by the widow as well as her failure to have an adoption set aside, the next reversioners have a right to have it set aside or declared invalid during the lifetime of the widow: Gurulinga-swami v. Ramlakshamma (4), Govinda Pillai v. Thayammal (5), Ramabai v. Rangrav (6), Abinash Chandra Mazumdar v. Harinath Shaha (7) and Jhula v. Kanta Prasad (8). Besides, if the plaintiffs are compelled to defer their action to have the adoption set aside till the death of the widow which might be definitely prolonged, the lapse of the time might obliterate the evidence available to prove that the adoption did not take place. This difficulty is recognised by Article 118, Schedule I of the Limitation Act which requires that a suit to set aside an adoption should be brought within six years from the date of the knowledge of the adoption, although the right to the possession of the property has not accrued.

The plaintiffs, therefore, in the circumstances are entitled to have a declaration during the lifetime of the widow that the adoption set up by the appellant did not take place and that he is not the adopted son of Singhesar, the father of the plaintiffs. Upon evidence the learned Subordinate Judge has held that Singhesar did not adopt the appellant. The near gotias of Singhesar named in the appellant's deposition in the Land Registration case to be present at the adoption have not been examined in this case. The account book showing the expenses of the adoption has not been filed and there is no deed of adoption executed by Singhesar during his lifetime. It is remarkable that in a hand-note executed after the death of Singhesar the appellant described him as his uncle, and not as his father. It is highly improbable that Singhesar would adopt a son when he and his wife were comparatively young. There is nothing to show that no son would have been born to him. He had already two daughters by his wife. I have not the least doubt that the Subordinate Judge was perfectly right in finding as a fact that the adoption did not take place.

It is next contended by the appellant that the claim set up by the appellant soon after the death of Singhesar and the litigation launched by him in the Civil Court to have himself declared as an adopted son of Singhesar was in itself a serious danger to the estate; that if the appellant had succeeded in that suit the estate would have been lost both to the widow and to the plaintiffs' reversioners; that the widow as the holder of the entire estate, though having only a life-interest, was entitled to enter into a compromise by way of a settlement of the dispute as to the title to the estate; and that the settlement by her was made in the interest of the estate itself and is binding upon the reversioners. I do not accept these contentions as sound in the circumstances of the case.

It must be shown that the arrangement embodied in the compromise petition was a bona fide settlement of dispute in the interest of the estate. If the settlement was not bona fide, the plaintiffs, not being parties to the litigation and the compromise, would not be bound by it. This leads to a consideration of whether the adoption was likely to be established and to what extent it caused a menace to the estate. The claim based upon the adoption set up by the appellant was refused by the Land Registration Deputy Collector, so that at the time of the litigation in the Civil Court in the course of which the compromise was effected, the adoption had been rejected by a public officer, and no tangible material has been placed before us to show that there was any possibility of the claim being successful in the Civil Court. The mere laying of the claim would not justify a prudent widow to accept adoption and thus to prejudice the interest of the remote reversioners. The widow seems to have been duped and deceived into recognising the adoption and compromising the suit. The widow was a pardanashin lady. She was admittedly suffering occasionally from insanity and was actually insane at the time the adoption is said to have taken place. She had no advice in the matter of the compromise from the lawyers who were acting on her behalf in the conduct of the suit. The compromise petition was drafted by a mukhtear of the appellant himself and was filed by a Junior Pleader who was engaged the very day the petition was filed in Court. There is evidence that this mukhtear bore questionable reputation and was accused of misappropriation of money which he had to deposit.

It appears that the appellant took advantage of the weak intellect and the occasional insanity of the musummat, and got this petition of compromise filed through an agent employed by himself. In the circumstances there is little room for doubt that the compromise was fraudulent and is not a voluntary act of the widow. The widow may have been actuated to enter into the compromise by a motive to secure to herself a personal advantage of enjoying half the property peacefully and free from the troubles of litigation. Such a compromise cannot be said to be a bona fide settlement of dispute in the interest of the estate and cannot bind the reversioners.

For the above reasons I entirely agree that the plaintiffs are entitled to both the declarations sought by them, viz, that the appellant was not the adopted son of Singhesar and that the compromise entered into by the widow is fraudulent and not binding upon them.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

In insolvency cases the proof of debts means that the creditor shall have proved his debt in some of the ways prescribed by the Provincial Insolvency Act and that his name shall have been put by the Court on the schedule of creditors. [p. 157, col. 1.]

In insolvency matters the schedule of creditors should be settled at as early a date as possible and where an application under section 27 of the Provincial Insolvency Act is made before a proposal for composition is finally accepted, no creditor is entitled to vote whose debt has not been proved and whose name has not been admitted on to the schedule by the Judge. Civil revision against the order of the District Judge, Agra, dated the 27th March 1915.

Mr. J. Nehru, for the Applicant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Sundar Lal, Messrs. Lalit Mohan Banerji, Mangal Prasad Bhargava and Baleshwari Prasad, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application arises out of an insolvency matter. Chandan Lal is the debtor. A petition for a declaration of insolvency was presented by one of his creditors. The debtor appears to have submitted a proposal for composition under section 27 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. This proposal was in the first instance accepted by the Judge of the Small Cause Court before whom the insolvency matter was pending. On an appeal, however, the matter was remanded with certain directions. As the result the Small Cause Court Judge refused to accept the composition. On appeal to the District Judge the order of the Small Cause Court was affirmed. The insolvent comes to this Court in an application by way of revision with various grounds of objection. The first ground was that the District Judge had erred in holding that certain debts, which were paid up subsequent to the application, should not be taken into account when considering the proposal for composition. Secondly because the debts had been legally proved and the petitioner was not bound to prove them in any particular way; thirdly, because under the circumstances the composition proposed by the applicant should have been accepted, and lastly, because the order of the District Judge was not in accordance with law.

We may point out that section 27, clause (2), expressly provides that the proposal for composition to be accepted must be accepted by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of all the creditors whose debts are proved and who are present in person or by a Pleader. We think that the proof of debts means that the creditor shall have proved his debt in some of the ways prescribed by the Act and that his name shall have been put by the Court on the schedule of creditors. In the present case some of the creditors had given no proof whatever of their debts—others had filed affidavits of their debts, but we do not know whether the Court even considered whether or not they were creditors and certainly they were not put on the schedule of creditors. Under these circumstances we do not see our way to interfere with the order of the Court below. We think, however, that all that has happened up to the present should not prevent the debtor from submitting a further proposal for composition, and we think that those creditors whom the Court finds to have been really creditors should be admitted on to the schedule upon proof of their debts (with a note, of course, to the effect that they had received part payment if such be the fact) and we think that these creditors might reasonably be included in the majority required by the section. But we think that no creditor should be entitled to vote whose debts have not been “proved as stated” above, that is to say, they must have proved their debts and their names admitted on to the schedule by the Judge. We think that in all these insolvency matters the schedule of creditors should be settled at as early a date as possible and before a proposal for composition is finally accepted. It is only by this means that the interests of all parties can be properly considered. We are asked to put some stay on the sale of the debtor’s property or the distribution of the money that may have been realised by such sale. We do not think that we ought to do this. Such an application ought to be made to the Judge before whom the insolvency matter is pending. No doubt if an application is made to him and he comes to the conclusion that a bona fide proposal for composition is about to be made by the judgment-debtor which is likely to be accepted by a majority of the creditors, such consideration will influence him in granting the application. We dismiss the application with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Application dismissed.

Ejectment—Co-sharer in possession of whole property dispossessed by trespasser—Adverse possession against co-sharer, effect of—Jus tertii, plea of.

One of two brothers, who had an undivided 8-annas share in a holding, assuming to himself the sole ownership of the holding leased it to the plaintiff intending to exclude his co-sharer, who had disappeared and was considered as dead or having abandoned the property. The plaintiff, having been ousted by the defendant (a trespasser), brought a suit for his ejectment:

Held, that as the title of the plaintiff’s lessor had become adverse to his co-sharer, the plaintiff obtained title to the whole by adverse possession and that, therefore, he was entitled to recover the whole property from the defendant whose plea of jus tertii could not be of any avail. Quære.—Whether an undivided co-sharer who is in exclusive possession of the whole property is entitled to recover the whole from a trespasser who dispossessed him, or is liable to be put in joint possession with the trespasser.

BASIRUDDI SHEIKH V. MOBARAK MUNSHI.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Zilla Khulna, dated the 24th March 1915, modifying that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at that place, dated the 30th June 1914.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Jadunath Kanjilal, (with him Bubu Karunamoy Ghose), for the Appellant.—Abdul is an 8-annas co-sharer. He was in exclusive possession. Gafur's whereabouts are not known. Defendant here comes as a trespasser so he cannot claim to be in joint possession with the plaintiff. Refers to Salmond's 'Jurisprudence' and Shama Charan Roy v. Surja Kanta (1). Plaintiff is entitled to possession against all except the actual owners. The plaintiff-appellant has proved his antecedent possession. Refers to Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mandal (2). If two brothers are tenants of the same property, and one brother goes away, the remaining brother has to pay the whole rent. The landlord cannot claim khas possession if one tenant is there. Abdul's possession was not illegal. The appellant is the holder of a bona fide lease, and he is entitled to be maintained in possession in each and every portion of the land. Abdul acted as an implied trustee of Gafur. In Shama Charan Roy v. Surja Kanta (1), the plaintiff was not in actual possession. A trespasser cannot plead jus tertii.

Babu Furna Chandra Roy, for the Respondent.—The defendant is not a trespasser. If the plaintiff had sued for confirmation of his possession, it would have been otherwise. The plaintiff's remedy is a suit for partition with the defendant. The plaintiff cannot succeed in a suit for ejectment against the defendant as regards the 8 annas. It has not been found that the plaintiff is the true owner, in which case the defendant could not be maintained in his possession.

Babu Jadunath Kanjilal, in reply.—There is a difference between right of possession and right to possession. The plaintiff has a right to possession of 16 annas as against a trespasser. If I am in possession of 16 annas, I have a right to be maintained in possession against the whole world except the real owner. As a lessee I have a good title.

[FLETCHER, J.—You cannot suggest that it is a suit for confirmation of possession when at the time of the institution of the suit, the plaintiff was out of possession.]

No, My Lord. The co-owner here is to be regarded as the full owner.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge of Khulna, modifying the decision of the Munsif of the same place. The suit was brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of certain property of which he had a lease. The first Court decreed the suit. The second Court modified the decree, giving the plaintiff possession of one-half. The plaintiff's case was that one Abdul was the original owner of the property who sold it to Meajan, who leased it out to the plaintiff as owner of the property in 1899. The plaintiff was in exclusive possession of the property until ousted by the defendant. The defendant alleged that Abdul had a brother named Gafur; and Gafur and Abdul granted a lease to the defendant's mother Pati Bewa. The Court held that the existence of Gafur and his interest in the property was not proved. The first Court held that the alleged lease to the defendant's mother had not been proved. The Court of first instance found that the plaintiff was in exclusive possession. The lower Appellate Court found that Gafur had an 8 annas share and that Gafur had obtained his interest in the holding. On that the plaintiff obtained possession of 8-annas share along with the defendant. The present appeal is preferred against that decision. First of all, it is quite clear that the plaintiff has been found to be an 8-annas co-sharer of an undivided share in the property and he is entitled to each and every part of it, and the defendant who is found to be a mere trespasser is obviously not entitled to be in joint possession along with the plaintiff in the 8-annas share. It might be that the suit being a suit for ejectment, the defendant's possession cannot be disturbed. It is quite clear that the plaintiff was put in possession and his possession will be the possession of Gafur or his heir, unless some act is done to exclude Gafur. The finding that has been made as to the possession of the plaintiff's lessor Abdul is not in very clear terms in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court. But it is quite clear that what the Judge means to find is that Abdul had been in exclusive possession from the time that Gafur went away and that Gafur had left the village for many years and had not been heard of. It is argued on that basis that the possession of Abdul would not be adverse to Gafur, unless there is some act to exclude Gafur. The act seems to be inconsistent with anything else except that the lessor of the plaintiff did mean to exclude his co-sharer and brother Gafur, who disappeared. There cannot be any doubt as regards the fact that Gafur was considered as dead or that he abandoned or left this small property and the plaintiff's lessor assumed to himself the sole ownership of the property and dealt with it without any reference to Gafur. I think, on the whole, that the facts warrant the finding that the title of Abdul had become adverse as against Gafur. If that is so, the case does not present any difficulty; because the plaintiff had his 8 annas plus the 8 annas of Gafur which he intended to have as his own and, as regards that, the plaintiff as representing Abdul is entitled to recover possession of the whole of the property. A case has been pointed out as regards the wider view involved and continually arising in this Court as to the value of the possessory title in a suit for ejectment where the plaintiff is unable to prove that he has got a title to the property. The case that has been pointed out in the judgment in Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mandal (2) is a matter of considerable difficulty. That difficulty is not lessened by the fact that a contrary rule has been observed in this Court for a considerable number of years. It may be that in some cases, e. g., in Shama Charan Roy v. Surja Kanta (1), on the facts Chief Justice Jenkins came to the conclusion that the suit was, in fact, a suit for confirmation of possession. I doubt whether the present suit could, in any view, be treated as a suit for confirmation of possession. I think that the evidence in the case is sufficient to show that the plaintiff obtained a title by adverse possession against Gafur. That gets rid of the plea of jus tertii set up by the defendant by showing that the interest of Gafur had ceased to exist by virtue of the Statute of Limitation. In that view, I set aside the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge and restore that of the Munsif.

SMITHER, J.—I agree.

Appeal accepted.

SECOND CIVIL APPEALS NOS. 1723 TO 1729,
1731 TO 1773 AND 1775 TO 1793 OF 1915.

December 20, 1916.

Present:—Mr. Justice Oldfield and Mr. Justice Spenser.

SUNDARAM IYER—PLAINTIFF—

versus

THEETHARAPPA MUDALIAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), ss. 3 (11), 143—Landlord and tenant—Varam tenure—Cesses claimable as rent, levy of, conditions of—Kanganam, levy of, legality of—Recognition of rights by Court—Subsequent non-enforcement—Abandonment, presumption of—Estoppel—Judgments not inter parties, admissibility of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 13, 115.

In considering whether the levy of particular cesses in a varam tenure must be disallowed under section 143 of the Madras Estates Land Act, a distinction must be made between fees which form part of the consideration for the ryot's holding and are leviable as incidental to the tenure and fees which by law or usage are payable in addition to the rent. For the former class of payments, the occupation of the land is the consideration, and, therefore, prima facie they are lawfully made. [p. 161, col. 1.]

Section 143 only applies to cesses which are additions to the rent. But if the fees claimed, instead of being cesses, are component parts of the rent by means of which the equality of varam is arrived at, the section will not apply. [p. 163, col. 1.]

A payment of fees claimed as rent for a series of years will not make them enforceable if they are not legally leviable. They will be payable if there is a valid, express or implied contract to pay. A contract cannot be implied where the payment is without consideration and is a voluntary one. [p. 163, col. 1.]

If a cess is shown to have been levied for a special purpose, there can be no implied contract to pay it after the purpose has ceased to exist, and payment of it will not thereafter be enforceable unless there is a fresh contract founded on a fresh consideration to continue the payment. [p. 163, col. 1.]

SUNDARAM IYER v. THEETHARAPPA MUDALIAR.

If a cess is otherwise valid, a contract to pay it can be implied from payments for a series of years or where it is the established usage or mameol of the estate to pay it. [p. 163, col. 1.]

The kanganam fee is a proper charge in addition to the rent and is legally leviable. [p. 164, col. 1.]

Arunachallam Chettiar v. Mangalam, 35 Ind. Cas. 329; 20 M. L. T. 70; 4 L. W. 37; 31 M. L. J. 168; Lakshman Govind v. Amrit Gopal, 24 B. 591, 2 Bom. L. R. 386; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 924, followed.

Judgments not inter partes are admissible in evidence where they are relevant under section 13 of the Evidence Act. They are evidence of usage as instances where the right in question was claimed or denied or recognized. Their evidentiary value, however, must depend on the facts of the particular case. [p. 160, col 2; p. 162, col. 1.]

Lakshman Govind v. Amrit Gopal, 24 B. 591; 2 Bom. L. R. 386; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 924; and Easwara Doss v. Pungavanachari, 13 M. 361; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 964, followed.

Per Krishnan, J.—Rent proper does not include payments made merely in connection with the use of land and under a liability only incidental to such use. Every payment by a tenant as such to the landlord will ordinarily have reference to the use and occupation of the land, as that is the foundation of the relationship between the parties. But, unless a payment is directly in consideration for such use, it cannot fall under the first paragraph of clause 11 of section 3 of the Act. [p. 162, col. 2.]

Where rights which have been recognized by Courts are not enforced by the landlord for some years, that fact alone cannot affect the rights themselves or lead to an inference of the abandonment of his rights by the owner. [p. 163, col. 2; p. 164, col. 1.]

Messrs. T. Narasimha Aiyangar, V. Raghavachariar, T. Nallasivam Pillai, K. R. Guruswami Aiyar and A. Swaminatha Aiyar, for the Respondents.

These second appeals and the memorandum of objections filed in Second Appeals Nos. 1723 to 1729, 1731 to 1746, 1748 to 1751, 1754 to 1757, 1759, 1760, 1762 to 1765, 1767 to 1773, 1775, 1777 to 1793 of 1915 coming on for hearing on the 24th, 25th and 26th July 1916, and having stood over for consideration till the 31st July 1916, the Court (Spencer and Krishnan, JJ.) delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—On the issue whether the pattas for Fasli 1312 are proper pattas, both the lower Courts, in consideration of the evidence afforded by previous decisions, some of which were between the same landlord and the predecessors-in-title of some of the tenants in these appeals, and by pattas and muchilikas of previous faslis, have come to the conclusion that the tenants of the Inam Vagailkulam village hold on a varam tenure, the proportion being half varam for the landlord and half for the tenant.

The lower Courts are also agreed in finding on the 9th and 10th issues that the inamdars are entitled to charge 2/5th varam for second crop cultivation on single crop lands, and to make the tenants contribute half faslijasti in addition to the varam when Government water is taken for a second crop on single crop lands.

These findings appear to be just and based on legal evidence of usage. It is contended on this and other issues that the judgments in previous suits are not admissible on the ground that they were not between the same parties and were not given effect to.

Under section 13 of the Indian Evidence Act, they afford instances of a local custom or usage being recognised and as such they are evidence, even though the tenants in the present cases were not parties to them [vide Easwara Doss v. Pungavanachari (1)].

This disposes of the memoranda of objections on these points.

Issue 7 is whether the plaintiff is legally entitled to the cesses claimed by him. On this head, the liability of the tenants to pay the following charges has been considered (1), Kanganam, (2) Porkattu, (3) Yavanai, (4) Kalavi Nazar, (5) Urai, (6) Vasi, (7) Kaval, (8) Alavu, (9) Attakottu.

The Sub-Collector allowed them all. The District Judge allowed (1), (2), (8) and (9) and disallowed (3), (4), (5), (6) and (7). The lessee appeals against all the items which have been disallowed. The tenants have raised objections to all those which have been allowed. In treating of these, a distinction must be made between fees, which form part of the consideration for the ryot's holding and are leviable as incidental to the tenure [vide the definition of 'rent' in section 3, clause (11) of the Madras Estates Land Act], and fees which by law or usage are payable in addition to the rent [vide sub-clause (a) of the same section]. See Devanai v. Ragunatha Row (2). For the former class of payments, the occupation of the land is the consideration and, therefore, prima facie they are lawfully made.

The Sub-Collector in deciding this issue did not keep this distinction in mind. He was satisfied with the conclusion that "the payment of cesses appears always to have been a recognised feature of the tenure under which lands were held in the estate."

The District Judge rightly observed that payment for a series of years would not make these sums enforceable if they are not legally leviable. That is the effect which section 143 of the Act has on cesses. This section only applies to cesses which are additions to the rent. But if these sums, instead of being cesses, are component parts of the rent by means of which the equality of varam is arrived at, then section 143 will not apply.

The District Judge treating all as cesses, but excluding Kanganam and Porkattu on account of a judgment of this Court dismissing an appeal against a decision of the District Court which once allowed these items, proceeded upon conjecture as to the purpose that these payments were intended to serve and upon some slight oral evidence as to their meaning, to decide whether they were legally leviable. For instance, in dealing with Yavanai, the Judge states that its meaning and object are not clear but he disallows it because it was disallowed in Second Appeal No. 1673 of 1888 and because he thinks it is not a legitimate charge.

In Second Appeal No. 1673 of 1888, the plaintiff failed to prove an unbroken custom for the charge. It has not been shown that the circumstances of these cases are the same.

Again, the Judge states that Kalvai Nazar is described as a cess for the maintenance of channels. He does not mention where this description occurs. The appellant's pleader maintains that it is for keeping channels clear of silt, a duty that is declared in section 137 of the Act to fall on the ryots. Urai is stated to be connected with the measurement of the crops. Judge allowed Alavu and Attakottu which were found to be connected with the same process, but disallowed Urai, Kaval and Vasi, are shown in the pattas as divided between the landlord and the tenant. There is so much uncertainty as to the significance of each of these charges that I doubt with reference to the frame of the issue if the parties at the trial were alive to the necessity of producing such evidence as might have been available to prove (1) whether they form part of the consideration for the occupation of the land or whether they are additions to the rent, (2) if they are additions, whether they are not legally leviable as (1) having been originally levied for a purpose which has since failed, (2) being voluntary payments, (3) being illegal as being forbidden by law or against public policy.

With the exception of Kanganam, the meaning of which is well known and which has been held in a similar case in Arunachallam Chettiar v. Mangalam (3), to be a proper charge in addition to the rent, I am of opinion that a finding is necessary on both these points and that the parties should be allowed to adduce fresh evidence on them. The present District Judge will be asked to return findings within eight weeks. Ten days will be allowed for filing objections.

KRISHNAN, J.—The questions that arise for decision in this batch of appeals are whether the patta tendered by the plaintiff was a proper patta and if not what is the proper patta. The tenant-defendants have objected to the patta as being a varam patta whereas their tenure, they say, is a Pattam one, and also as containing nine cesses and half fasli just improperly claimed by the landlord's lessee, the plaintiff.

SUNDARAM IYER v. THEETHARAPPA MUDALIAR.

The cesses objected to are Yavanai, Kalvai Nazar, Urai, Vasi, Kaval fees, Kanganam, Porkattu, Attakottu and Alavu. The first Court held that the tenure was a varam tenure and that the cesses were all rightly claimable. On appeal, the learned District Judge, while upholding the finding as to the tenure, disallowed the first five of the above mentioned items as improper ones and allowed the rest. Both Courts allowed the half fasli just claimed. Plaintiff has appealed against that decree in so far as it was against him and the defendants have filed memorandum of objections.

The nature of the tenure is the first point for decision. Both the lower Courts have found that it is varam tenure on this estate. It is objected for the tenants that the Courts have wrongly relied too much on judgment exter partes as they are inadmissible in evidence and even if admitted are of very little evidentiary value. It is now settled law that judgment not inter partes are still admissible in evidence where they are relevant under section 13 of the Evidence Act. They are evidence of usages as instances where the right in question was claimed or denied or recognised. See Lakshman Govind v. Amrit Gopal (4), Easwara Doss v. Pungavanachari (1). Their evidentiary value must depend upon the facts of the particular case. Where, as in this case, the varam right was claimed on several previous occasions and every time successfully, the value of the previous judgments is not so negligible as the defendants try to make out. They were more than once followed up by the acceptance of pattas. See Exhibits J series, T and U and execution of muchilikas Exhibit A series by the tenants wherein the varam tenure was expressly recognised by them. There is also other evidence to support the finding. I accept the finding that the tenure in this estate is a varam tenure.

The next question for decision is which of the charges claimed should be allowed or disallowed. This question must now be decided under section 143 of the Estates Land Act. The word 'rent' in that section is defined in section 3, clause 11 (a), as including "any local tax, cess, fee or sum payable in addition to the rent according to law or usage having the force of law." Cesses which do not fall under this definition must be disallowed under section 143. It is urged for the appellant that all the charges claimed by the landholder are payable by the tenants according to the usage or mamool of the estate. This must, no doubt, be established by the landholder.

Before considering this question, an argument adduced for the appellant that the different payments claimed by him though called by different names are all part and parcel of the varam or "rent" as defined in the 1st paragraph of clause (11) section 3 and that as half varam is lawfully payable by the tenants for their holdings, no question about the legality of each of these payments arises, has to be dealt with. "Rent" as defined in that paragraph is "what is lawfully payable in money or in kind or both to a landholder for the use or occupation of land in the estate for the purpose of agriculture." It is what may be called the rent proper to distinguish it from the payments included in "rent" by the rest of the clause. Rent proper clearly does not include payments made merely in connection with the use of land and under a liability only incidental to such use. Of course, every payment by a tenant as such to the landlord will ordinarily have reference to the use and occupation of the land, as that is the foundation of the relationship between the parties. But, unless a payment is directly in consideration for such use, it cannot fall under the first paragraph of clause 11, section 3 of the Act. It is not clear if the payments in question here satisfy this test as their nature and the object of their levy have not been elucidated by evidence. They are all apparently payments for purposes in connection with the tenancy but it is not clear if they are part of the varam as argued. They have been treated as cesses by the plaintiff in the plaint and the issue as to them has been framed on that footing. But that is not conclusive; there must be a finding on this point on fresh evidence.

It was argued that at any rate "Yavanai" which is stated to mean collection charges by plaintiff's Counsel should be treated as part of the varam and the case in Radha Charan Ray Chowdhry v. Golak Chandra Ghose (5) is cited as an authority for it. Collection charges may in certain cases be part of the rent proper as held in the case cited; but that depends on the facts of the particular case. Here, it is not clear what the nature or object of Yavanai is, to decide the question. Even if the payments claimed in this case are all cesses by virtue of the second paragraph and sub-clause (a) of clause (11) they will still be included in the term 'rent' under section 143 if they are payable according to law or usage having the force of law.

(4) 24 B. 591; 2 Bom. L. R. 386; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 924.

The question thus arises for decision, whether all or any of them are payable according to law? They will be so payable if there is a valid, express or implied contract to pay. A contract cannot be implied where the payment is without consideration and is a voluntary one as for example temple fees. See Siriparapu Ramanna v. Mallikarjuna Prasada Nayudu (6); or in the case where the payment is of a cess illegal in its very nature. If the cess was shown to have been levied for a special purpose, then also there can be no implied contract to pay it after the purpose has ceased to exist; and payment of it will no longer be enforceable unless there was a fresh contract founded on a fresh consideration to continue the payment. See Ramaswami Aiyar v. Sundaram Aiyar (7). If a cess is otherwise valid, a contract to pay it can be implied from payments for a series of years or where it is the established usage or mamool of the estate to pay it.

The Sub-Collector in the first Court found on the evidence that the payment of these "cesses" was always a recognised feature of the tenure of this estate. The Appellate Court has not given a finding on the point but has disallowed some of the 'cesses' as not being necessary or legitimate charges and allowed others as legitimate ones excluding from consideration Kanganam and Porkattu "in view of the High Court's decision allowing them". As all the evidence on this point is now on record and we have been taken through that evidence at considerable length it seems to me it is not necessary to call for a finding on this question, namely, whether these charges are leviable according to usage, from the lower Court as we can ourselves come to a finding on the point under section 103, Civil Procedure Code, and as the finding is one of mixed law and fact.

The Sub-Collector has set out the evidence on the point; it is not necessary to do so again; on that evidence, I am of opinion that his finding that the payment of these charges and the half fasli just was recognised feature of the tenure is correct. As Exhibit JJ proceeded on a manifest mistake and Exhibit P merely followed it on this question, no great value can be attached to them as showing the terms of the tenure on this estate. Neither they nor the subsequent conduct of the lessee is binding on the owner. It was strenuously argued on this issue also that the previous judgments should not be relied on to find the usage on this estate (1) as they were not inter parties and (2) as they were not acted upon. I have already held the judgments though exter parties are relevant evidence and in the circumstances of this case, I think they are very material evidence. Pattas and muchilikas were exchanged in accordance with them. See Exhibit A series, Q, S, T, U, U1. As the tenants were refractory and were raising disputes necessitating litigation more than once and as they would not pay rent as they were bound to do the then lessees apparently found it convenient to take from them what they could collect without trouble. It is in evidence that from 1890-91 these charges were not separately collected but were consolidated with the varam and a lump amount taken dividing the crop in the ratio of 10 to 11. That was during the time of a lessee; but when the agent of the owner came in, he seems to have collected them for some time according to the pattas. The earlier judgments in evidence really shew what the rights of parties were as recognised by the Courts; the fact that those rights were not enforced in full by the lessees from the owner for some years cannot affect the rights themselves or lead to an inference of abandonment of his rights by the owner. As regards Kanganam and Porkattu, even Exhibit P allowed them and Exhibit V series expressly recognises them as payable. Taking then that the charges claimed were payable by the tenants according to the usage of the estate, the question still remains whether any of them should be disallowed as being illegal, voluntary or for a purpose which has now ceased to exist. These cases have not been tried from this point of view as they were apparently not presented in that light in the first Court. The lower Appellate Court has acted mainly on its own opinion as to what may be considered unnecessary or illegitimate charges, evidence on the point and as to the nature of the payments claimed being very meagre. It is not satisfactory to dispose of these cases without the parties being given a fresh opportunity to adduce evidence on these points.

1. The Kanganam fee should, however, be excluded from any fresh enquiry as this High Court has already considered its character and held that it is a cess that is legally leviable. See Arunachallam Chettiar v. Mangalam (3) and as the varam system is still in force on this estate, its purpose cannot be said to have ceased. I agree with the ruling above cited and allow this fee in the landlord's favour.

The Yavanai fee has been held to be not a legitimate charge by the learned District Judge on the strength of a ruling of this Court in Second Appeal No. 1673 of 1888. But a reference to that ruling shows that the cess in question was then disallowed on the ground that it was not proved and not on the ground that it was an illegal cess. The ruling, therefore, is no authority to support the view of the lower Court. The item in question must be included, therefore, in the fresh enquiry proposed.

As to half fasli just, it was allowed by the earlier judgments referred to above. It was only disallowed by Exhibits JJ and P by a mistake as already explained. It seems to me to be fair to both sides to make each party pay half the fasli just particularly as the tenant pays only 2/5th varam for the 2nd crop. I will allow this.

2. It remains to notice an argument by plaintiff's Counsel that, by Exhibit C, the question of the liability to pay these charges is made res judicata between his client and the tenants who were parties to that judgment. There is no force in this argument as the liability of the parties has now to be judged with reference to a new enactment, the Madras Estates Land Act, which has come into force since the date of Exhibit C. The payment of rent in the suit fasli cannot depend upon what was decided to be the proper rent before this Act came into force. It is also pointed out that the identity of the subject-matter is not established.

I, therefore, agree that before finally disposing of these appeals, the learned District Judge be asked to submit a finding after giving an opportunity to the parties to adduce fresh evidence on the two issues framed by my learned brother excluding Kanganam fee therefrom.

This order applies to all cases except Second Appeals Nos. 1730 and 1774 where the respondents have died and no legal representatives have been brought on the record yet.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgments, the District Judge of Tinnevely submitted the following

FINDING

I think they must have considered these various items as necessary items, connected with the division of produce, and must have collected the same as part of the rent, the landlord being responsible for payment to persons doing the work for which charges have been shown as payable to him and vice versa. Even if they are looked upon as cesses, additions, there is absolutely nothing from which one could infer that such payments were either voluntary or illegal.

These second appeals coming on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Appellate Court upon the issues referred by this Court for trial the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts are these. One Ganga Din executed a document on the 2nd of June 1909 purporting to be a deed of gift of certain property belonging to himself in favour of the idol Sri Rangji Maharaj. By that document he clearly made an endowment of his property for the maintenance of the temple of Thakurji and also for the establishment of a Sanskrit patshala. He also provided in the document for other matters which the trustees nominated by him would have to carry out in connection with the endowment and declared what expenditure should be incurred in relation thereto. There can be no doubt that under this document an express trust was created for religious and charitable purposes. In this deed of trust he nominated himself as the first manager of the trust and named three persons, namely, Siddhan Lal, Raghubar Dayal and Jhamman Lal as his successor in the office of manager after his death. On the 2nd of February 1911 he executed another document under which he nominated Siddhan Lal, Jugal Kishore and Maiku Lal to be managers in the place of the three persons named above for the management of the endowment after his death. He also provided in that document that instead of a patshala being established the money provided for the patshala should be spent in sadabart, that is, charity. The present suit was brought with the permission of the Legal Remembrancer by two members of the Hindu community for the removal of the defendants from the management of the property, on the ground that they had obtained the document of 1911 by undue influence from Ganga Din and that they were mismanaging the trust property and had committed a breach of trust by omitting to perform the duties imposed upon the trustees by the maker of the trust. We may mention that Ganga Din died in 1912. The Court below has decreed the claim and made an order removing the defendants from the management of the trust. It refused to appoint Raghubar Dayal and Jhamman Lal as trustee but made a reference to the Collector for the nomination of trustees and reserved to itself the power of appointing new trustees for the management of the trust. This appeal has been preferred by the defendants, and the first contention on their behalf is that this case could not be instituted under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They urge that if the plaintiff's contention is correct that the appointment of the defendants was not legally valid, they are trespassers and could not be sued under section 92 as trustees. In our opinion this contention is untenable. No doubt Ganga Din, the maker of the trust, was entitled at the time of creating the trust to nominate the persons who were to be managers of the trust after the date of the creation of the trust and to provide for the appointment of further trustees. As has been already stated he declared that he himself would be the first manager (sarbarakar) and that after his death Jhamman Lal, Raghubar Dayal and Siddhan Lal should be the managers. It was not open to him after the trust had been created to nominate new managers who were to take his place after his death. Subsequently to the creation of the trust his position was merely that of manager and he was not competent to revoke the trust or alter it, or appoint new managers. Therefore, with the exception of Siddhan Lal, who is one of the trustees mentioned in the original deed of trust, the other two defendants are not men who have been validly appointed trustees or could be so appointed. They by their own admission have taken charge of the trust property not as trespassers but as managers of the trust, and, therefore, they must be deemed to be trustees de son tort. In our opinion section 92 applies to the case of persons who are trustees de son tort. This was held by the Bombay High Court in Jugalkishore v. Lakshmandas (1) and by the Calcutta High Court in Budree Das Mukim v. Chooni Lal Johurry (2).

It is next urged that it has not been proved that the defendants have committed a breach of trust. It has been found by the Court below that the temple erected by Ganga Din in which the Thakurji was installed has not been repaired by the defendants and that it is in a hopelessly bad state of repair. According to the defendants' own allegations they have not spent even Rs. 2 in repairing the temple. Under the terms of the document of the 12th of June 1909 Rs. 25 a year were allotted for repairs of the temple but no part of this money has been spent for that purpose, and the result has been that the temple is in such a condition that after a short time, unless properly repaired, it will cease to exist. Again under the terms of the trust a Sanskrit patshala had to be established. There is some evidence that in the lifetime of Ganga Din a small patshala was started with a small number of students, but by reason of his illness it was not continued.

It was the duty of the trustees in the performance of what was incumbent on them under the terms of the deed of trust to establish a Sanskrit patshala and to carry it on with the means at their disposal. This has not been done and this is another breach of the duties which the managers had to perform.

The defendants produced certain account books the genuineness of which the Court below has doubted. We have seen the account books and we are not prepared to say that the suspicions of the Court below as regards their genuineness are unfounded. The learned Judge has dealt with the matter at length and he has given other reasons for coming to the conclusion that the defendants have not carried out the objects of the trust and have not defrayed all the expenses which they were bound to do under the terms of the trust deed of 1909. We do not deem it necessary to go at length into those matters. We have considered the evidence on the point and agree with the findings of the Court below. We do not consider it necessary to decide in this case whether the document of the 2nd of February 1911 was obtained by undue influence. In our opinion Ganga Din was not competent to execute that document after having created a trust under the prior document of the 12th of June 1909. We think that the learned Judge came to a right conclusion in this case and this appeal must fail some objections have been preferred on behalf of the plaintiffs. One of them is to the effect that the learned Judge ought to have ordered the defendants to render accounts. We think that having regard to the circumstances the learned Judge exercised a wise discretion in leaving the matter open and directing that it would be for the new trustees to sue the defendants separately for accounts or for recovery of ornaments if they thought fit to do so.

Another objection taken on behalf of the plaintiffs was that one Rup Lal should not have been appointed a trustee by the Court below. We have nothing on the record to show that Rup Lal has been appointed and there are no materials before us to enable us to consider whether that appointment is a proper one or not, if in fact Rup Lal has been appointed. The objections taken on behalf of the plaintiffs are without force.

DEFENDANT NO. 1—APPELLANT

THE STANDARD BANK, LIMITED—

PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Mortgage of shares—Company—Liquidation—Payment of calls by mortgagee—Mortgagee, whether can recover amount from mortgagor.

Plaintiff advanced a sum of money to the defendant on the security of certain shares in the S. Bank in February 1913. In October 1913 defendant wished to overdraw his account with the plaintiff Bank, and this was allowed on a deposit of some more shares in terms of a formal overdraft agreement. All the shares deposited were transferred to the plaintiff Bank's name on the share register of the S. Bank, and dividends when received were credited by the plaintiff Bank to the loan account of the defendant. In September 1913, the S. Bank shares began to fall, and the plaintiff Bank sold some of the mortgaged shares before a winding up order was made for the compulsory liquidation of the S. Bank. In the liquidation the plaintiff Bank was placed on the A list of contributories for the shares held by them, and on the B list for the shares sold by them, and were forced to pay calls:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff Bank could recover the amount of principal and interest advanced by it to the defendant, but that it was not entitled to the amount paid by it as calls or to any declaration of indemnity as to its liability in respect of the shares sold by it; [p. 169, col. 2]

(2) that the plaintiff did not occupy the position of trustee for the mortgagors at the time of paying the calls and was, therefore, not entitled to an indemnity as trustee. [p. 170, col. 1.]

Phene v. Gillan, (1845) 5 Hare 1; 15 L. J. Ch. 65; 9 Jur. 1086; 67 E. R. 803; 71 R. R. 1, relied upon.

It is not an implied condition of a contract of mortgage that the mortgagor should indemnify the mortgagee against the consequences of holding property which he holds for his own security and not for the benefit of the mortgagor. [p. 169, col. 2.]

A forced payment of a call by the registered holder of shares upon a compulsory liquidation cannot be regarded as an expenditure for the preservation of the security. [p. 170, col. 1.]

FACTS of the case appear from the following judgment of SCOTT, C. J.—The question in this appeal is as to the liability of the defendant in respect of certain loans granted by the respondents on a security of shares of the Indian Specie Bank which were not fully paid and upon which on liquidation of that Bank a large liability in respect of the calls has resulted. It is conceded on behalf of the appellant that no question was raised in the lower Court either in the issues or the argument disputing the liability of the first defendant to indemnify the plaintiffs against the liability incurred by them as contributories in respect of the said shares in the winding up. And it is stated that it was not realized in the lower Court that the liability of the first defendant can be successfully disputed upon legal grounds.

The question is one of great importance as may be seen from the decree which provides for a sum aggregating Rs. 1,72,200 in respect of calls already paid in the liquidation and there is a further decree against the first defendant to indemnify the plaintiff Bank against further calls.

The plaintiffs allege that the question is not merely one of law but will turn largely on the question of fact, because they say that there was or were a conversation or conversations in which the first defendant or his agent undertook to indemnify the plaintiff Bank in respect of any calls which might be made upon the shares.

We think that if the legal issue is allowed to be tried, the issue of fact must also be tried, and having regard to the importance of the case, we do not think that we can rightly dispose of the suit without a decision on the issues. Therefore, under Order XLI, rule 25, we frame the following issues:—

(1) Whether the first defendant by his agent did not agree to indemnify the plaintiff Bank with regard to any unpaid calls on these shares?

(2) Whether in any event the first defendant is not liable to indemnify the Bank with regard to such calls?

We refer these issues for trial to the lower Court and direct it to take such additional evidence as may be required and return the evidence and the findings and the reasons therefor, in due course to this Appeal Court.

With regard to the first question argued as to the election of the plaintiffs, we are of opinion that there can be no election in a case where the principal, who is now the first defendant, has deceived the plaintiffs.

Costs costs in the appeal.

The issues were tried by Macleod, J., who found both issues in the negative.

JUDGMENT.

SCOTT, C. J.—The plaintiffs are the Standard Bank.

In February 1913, a broker named Hemchand asked the Managing Director of the Bank to advance money on the security of shares in the Indian Specie Bank with the result that a transaction was recorded by him in the following terms.

"Bombay, 26th February 1913.

I have arranged by your order and on your account a loan for twelve months on 2,000 to 2,500 shares of the Indian Specie Bank, Limited, at Rs. 50 per share; the loan to be given to Bansidhar Mangtula at 7 per cent., and a margin of Rs. 15 per share to be maintained by the borrower; the shares to be transferred to the Bank's name. Money payable on or before the 10th March 1913."

On the 10th March, 1913, Bansidhar Mangtula acting on behalf of an undisclosed principal the 1st defendant Birdichand Jivraj executed a demand promissory note in favour of the Bank for Rs. 1,25,000 and that sum was carried to a suspense account to be at the disposal of Bansidhar. Shares aggregating 2,500 were afterwards brought to the Bank with blank transfers.

On the 4th of April 1913, it was arranged through the same broker that the plaintiff Bank should advance a further sum of Rs. 45,000 on 1000 shares of the Indian Specie Bank.

The note of the transaction was as follows;

"Bombay, 4th April 1913.

"I have this day arranged by your order and on your account a loan for Rs. 45,000 fixed for 12 months on 1000 Indian Specie Bank Limited, shares.

A margin of Rs. 15 to be maintained at 7½ per cent. Payable on or about 9th April 1913."

On the 9th April, a demand promissory note for Rs. 45,000 was passed to the plaintiff Bank by Bansidhar and the amount was carried partly to suspense account and partly to Bansidhar's account.

The amount provided by these loans having been fully utilized Bansidhar wanted in October 1913 to overdraw his current account. This was allowed to the extent of Rs. 4,200 on a deposit of 105 more shares in terms of a formal printed overdraft agreement of which paragraphs 4 and 5 were as follows:—

"4. I agree and undertake that the value of the shares deposited with you as security as aforesaid shall at all time exceed in value at the market price of the day the amount due by me to you so that the security may at the value aforesaid exceed the amount of my indebtedness to you by a margin of rupees 15 per share and in the event of the said shares at any time becoming of less value at the market price of the day so as not to provide the margin agreed on as aforesaid I agree and undertake to forthwith make up such deficiency on demand by you either by depositing further security approved of by you sufficient to make up the security to the agreed amount or by making part payment of the moneys due by me so that my indebtedness may be reduced to an amount for which the security so deposited amounts to Rs. 15 per share in excess of the amount due by me. So that you may always be secured by shares or other security approved by you which at the market value thereof of the day shall at least exceed in value by Rs. 15 per share the amount of my indebtedness from time to time to you.

"5. That you or your Managing Director shall be at liberty in default of my paying the moneys for the time being due to you by me on demand, or in default of my keeping up the full margin of security of the value as aforesaid and without any consent or concurrence on my part to sell the said shares or other security deposited from time to time by me or any of them by public auction or private contract and in such manner in all respects as you may think fit and out of the proceeds thereof to pay—

“(a) All expenses of and incidental to such sale and also all costs and expenses which may have been incurred by you in consequence of such default in payment of the said loan or in maintaining the full margin of value of the said shares as aforesaid.

“(b). The debt then due to you with interest. You shall be at liberty in the event of any default on my part in payment of such moneys on demand or in maintaining the full margin of value, to purchase yourselves the said shares or any of them at the market price of the day on which such default shall have been made.”

All the shares deposited by Bansidhar were transferred to the plaintiff Bank's name on the share register of the Specie Bank. Dividends when received were credited to the loan account.

In September 1913, the Indian Specie Bank shares began to fall and on the 7th October, Bansidhar provided further securities as margin which realised about Rs. 20,000 but thereafter he failed to provide any further margin and eventually 181 shares were sold by the plaintiff Bank of which 161 had been transferred before a winding up was made for the compulsory liquidation of the Specie Bank. In the liquidation the plaintiff Bank has been placed on the A list of contributories for 3444 shares and on the B list for 161 of the shares deposited by Bansidhar. A call of Rs. 50 per share has been paid by the plaintiff Bank in respect of the 3444 shares.

Decrees have been passed at the suit of the plaintiff Bank against both Bansidhar the ostensible borrower and Birdichand his undisclosed principal for debt and interest aggregating Rs. 3,50,560 which includes both the amount due for advances and interest and the amount paid by the plaintiff Bank on the call made on the Specie Bank shares. The decree also declares that the plaintiff Bank are entitled to be indemnified for any claim which may be made against them in respect of the 161 shares for which the plaintiffs are entered as contributories on the B list in the liquidation proceedings of the Specie Bank.

The only question now in dispute in this appeal is whether the plaintiffs can recover from the defendants as a debt the amount paid in respect of the call and whether they are entitled to an indemnity in respect of the 161 shares as declared by the decree.

It is not now contended that there was any special agreement to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the uncalled liability on the Specie Bank shares at the time of the deposit. It has been held by the lower Court that the evidence adduced fails to establish any such agreement and no exception is now taken to that finding.

Substantially the argument for the plaintiffs was confined to the suggestion of an implied agreement by the borrower to indemnify the lender in respect of a security which might be onerous. It was said this must have been the business understanding between the parties and that no lender would lend except upon such an agreement to indemnify.

It is pretty certain, however, that the possibility of the Indian Specie Bank going into compulsory liquidation during the continuance of the loan transaction never entered into the contemplation of the parties and even in October 1913 after the share had begun to fall in value the plaintiffs were still willing to allow an overdraft on a deposit of some of the same shares carrying the same uncalled liability.

Had the possibility of calls on the shares been considered the plaintiffs would either have left them in the name of the then registered owner, or, if they wished to take a transfer, would have refrained from doing so except upon an express indemnity. It is not unreasonable to suppose having regard to the magnitude of the transactions that the plaintiffs, had they realised the risk attaching to such shares, would have taken the ordinary precautions suggested by business experience: See Davidson's Conveyancing Volume II, part 11, page 1203. So much for the suggested implication of fact.

Nor can it be successfully contended that as a matter of law it is part of the contract that the mortgagor should indemnify the mortgagees against the consequences of holding property which they held for their own security and not for the benefit of the mortgagor. The mortgagees received the dividends on the shares in excess of the interest on the loan, and credited such excess in reduction of their debt and they must be supposed to have contemplated all the liabilities to which the holding of such shares might subject them. It was held in Phene v. Gillan (1) that there is not at law any such implied contract of indemnity. It is impossible to contemplate the mortgagors in such a case as the present attempting to redeem the Specie Bank shares and I doubt if a forced payment of a call by the registered holder of shares upon a compulsory liquidation could be regarded as an expenditure for the preservation of the security or expenditure contemplated in clause 5 of the overdraft agreement. The mortgagees in the present case did not, in my opinion, occupy the position of trustees for the mortgagors at the time of paying the calls and cannot, therefore, be entitled to an indemnity as trustees.

The decree of the lower Court must, therefore, be varied by limiting the sum decreed to the amount of the advances, interest and costs and by deleting the declaration as to indemnity.

Defendants must pay the costs of the appeal up to and including the 20th of July. The plaintiffs must pay the subsequent costs of the appeal but the parties must bear their own costs of the remand and findings thereon since they were rendered necessary by the defendant's oversight at the original hearing. The order as to costs in the original Court will stand.

Decree varied.

Application, under Order XLVII, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, for review of the judgment of the High Court, dated the 4th February 1916, in Appeal against Order No. 407 of 1914, presented against the order, dated the 5th September 1914 of the District Court, Tinnevelly, in Original Petition No. 755 of 1913.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri (with him Messrs. E. S. Chidambaram Pillai and S. Anantarama Aiyar), for the Petitioners.

Mr. M. D. Devadoss, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a petition for review of the judgment pronounced by myself and Moore, J., on the 4th February 1916 in Appeal against Order No. 407 of 1914.

RAMAKRISHNA IYER v. OFFICIAL RECEIVER, TINNEVELLY.

That appeal was preferred by one Mr. Gopaliah (then Official Receiver of Tinnevelly) against the order passed by the District Judge of Tinnevelly refusing the Receiver's application made under section 37 of the Provincial Insolvency Act III of 1907 to annul certain alienations made by an adjudicated insolvent in favour of one of his creditors (namely, the firm represented by the respondents Nos. 1 and 2) within three months before the adjudication.

Pending Appeal against Order No. 407 of 1914 in this Court, Mr. Gopaliah the Official Receiver resigned his post and a new Receiver was appointed by the Local Government for the Tinnevelly District. The appeal came on for hearing before myself and Moore, J., on the 4th February 1916. Mr. Deva Doss had filed the appeal for Mr. Gopaliah, the then Official Receiver. I accept Mr. Deva Doss's statement that on 4th February 1916 he represented to us that Mr. Gopaliah had resigned his post of Official Receiver and that another gentleman (Mr. Subramania Iyer) had been appointed as Official Receiver that a doubt was suggested before us by the learned Counsel whether it was necessary to have the name of the new Official Receiver substituted for that of Mr. Gopaliah in the appeal records before the appeal could be heard and that we intimated that all that was necessary was that instead of the appellant being described as Mr. P. A. Gopaliah, Official Receiver of Tinnevelly, thereafter, he might be described simply as the Official Receiver of Tinnevelly. I also accept Mr. Deva Doss's statement that he represented to us that he had instructions to continue the appeal on behalf of the Official Receiver.

After hearing both sides fully, we allowed the appeal and declared the alienations made by the insolvent to the firm of the respondents Nos. 1 and 2 void as against the Official Receiver.

In drawing up the fair copies of our judgment and order, the office has repeated the name of Gopaliah before the description of the appellant as the Official Receiver of Tinnevelly. That is a clerical error which must be corrected.

This petition of review is filed by the firm of S. R. M. V. S. S. V. Ramakrishna Aiyar who are the respondents Nos. 1 and 2 in the appeal. The Official Receiver of Tinnevelly is the respondent in this review petition which does not mention the officer's individual name. The only arguable ground on which this review petition is sought to be supported is the 1st ground which is as follows:—

"The decision of the learned Judges is vitiated in law in that the appellant had resigned and so had no locus standi to appear and the new Receiver was not brought on record before the case was heard."

It is argued in support of this ground, that the decision in Akula Paradesi v. Dhelli Jagannadha Row (1) constrains me to hold that the appeal was heard in the absence of the proper party as appellant and that the devolution of interest to the next Receiver was of such a kind that the old Receiver could not continue to represent the interests involved in the appeal even for the purpose of the further conduct of the appeal. The Calcutta case reported as Rai Charan Mandal v. Biswanath Mandal (2) considers devolutions of interest through transfers of the interests of private parties and so far as such litigation is concerned, the original parties can continue the litigation effectively. The decision in Akula Paradesi v. Dhelli Jagannadha Row (1), however, draws a distinction between the continuation of litigation by a private person whose interest has ceased through assignment or devolution and the continuation of litigation by one whose right to conduct the litigation was based solely on his character of a Receiver or Trustee appointed by the Court and whose character as such ceased during the pendency of the litigation. The learned Judges say that in the latter case "the law necessarily implies the absence of all interest in the subject of litigation," when the official capacity of the party litigant whose name is on the record terminates and that his continuance of the litigation after such termination would be futile save in very exceptional cases as "where the right of action accrued by virtue of mere possession or by virtue of their being contracting parties themselves" and so on.

Mr. Deva Doss argued contra that the case of Akula Paradesi v. Dhelli Jagannadha Row (1) related to a Receiver appointed under section 503 of the old Civil Procedure Code for a particular suit or particular suits and that the ratio of that decision could not apply to an Official Receiver in whom ex officio all the properties of the insolvent become vested and who by reason of the office becomes entitled to institute and continue suits. Mr. Deva Doss relied upon the analogy of the Official Assignee on the Original Side of the High Court, of the Advocate General, the Administrator General and so on who bring and defend suits in their official designations and whose successors are entitled to continue the conduct of the litigation (according to what Mr. Deva Doss alleged was the uniform practice) without their successors names being brought on the record.

I am not well acquainted with the practice as regards suits brought by or against the Official Assignee of Madras or the Advocate General or the Administrator General where there has been a change of officers pending the litigation and I shall not express any opinion as regards the legality of the practice alleged by Mr. Deva Doss assuming it to exist. It seems, however, that a distinction might be fairly drawn between the position of the Official Assignee in Madras and the position of an Official Receiver in the Mofussil. Whereas under section 17 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act 111 of 1909 the effect of the order of adjudication is at once to vest in the Official Assignee all the properties of the insolvent, under the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 (section 19, clause 2 read with sections 16 and 18), the properties of an adjudicated insolvent vest in the Official Receiver in the Mofussil only when the Court appoints a Receiver for the property of the Insolvent under section 18, clause 1 [Official Receiver of Trichinopoly v. Soma-sundaram Chettiar (3)]. Section 18, clause 1 is as follows: "The Court may, at the time of the order of adjudication, or at any time afterwards, appoint a Receiver for the property of the insolvent, and such property shall thereupon vest in such Receiver." It is also to be noted that under section 83 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, the Official Assignee may sue and be sued by the name of "the Official Assignee of the property of the insolvent" without mentioning his own name.

Under section 61, again, of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, "the property of the insolvent shall pass from Official Assignee to Official Assignee...for the time being during his continuance in office, without any transfer whatever." There seem to be no provisions in the Provincial Insolvency Act corresponding to sections 83 and 61 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (at least none was pointed out to me). It is, however, open to argument that section 61 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act was enacted merely through abundant caution and that the provision which makes the property of the insolvent vest in the Official Receiver implies that on the change of the personnel of the Official Receiver the property vests ipso facto in the new Official Receiver. I think it is unnecessary for me to pursue the matter further as I think that this review petition might be disposed of on another ground which I shall at once proceed to state.

At the hearing of the appeal before myself and Moore, J., it is admitted (see ground No. 2 of the Review Petition itself), that the resignation of the Receiver Mr. Gopaliah was brought to our notice and also the fact that a new Receiver had been appointed. Supposing an amendment of the records became, in consequence, necessary, I think it must be taken that myself and Moore, J., treated the record as amended by striking out the name of Mr. Gopaliah from the record and by retaining only the words "Official Receiver, Tinnevelly" and that we held further that such a description represented the new Receiver sufficiently. The respondents Nos. 1 and 2 in the appeal (who are the petitioners in review) did not object to the hearing of the appeal on the footing, as if the appellant on the record was the new Receiver who was continuing the conduct of the appeal filed by the old Receiver and did not object that the new Receiver's name should be formally and expressly entered on the record or that his description as Official Receiver was not legally sufficient. I think that under these circumstances it must be taken that our decision was given in favour of the new Official Receiver and must be held to accrue for the benefit of the Official Receiver for the time being. I, therefore, dismiss this petition for review with costs.

Petition dismissed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 62, applicability of—Suit for rent—Alternative claim for money-decree against plaintiff's co-sharers, maintainability of.

Article 62 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act applies to a suit for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use, even where the defendant at the time when he received the money did not intend to pay it to the plaintiff. [p. 174, col. 1.]

The operation of the Article is attracted, if it is established that the money received by the defendant is money which belongs to the plaintiff, and is repayable to him in justice, equity and good conscience. [p. 174, col. 1.]

A suit is maintainable in the form in which a decree for arrears of rent is claimed against the tenant-defendants, with an alternative prayer at the same time for a money-decree against the other set of defendants—the co-sharers of the plaintiff—in case it is held that they have realised the entire rent from the tenant-defendants. [p. 174, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Newbould, dated the 12th January 1916.

FACTS.—This appeal is preferred by the plaintiff, and it arises out of a suit for recovery of arrears of rent, brought by the plaintiff against the tenants. The co-sharer landlords were made parties to the suit; and the plaintiff among other things, prayed that a decree be passed against a co-sharer landlord, if the Court found that he had received the rents from the tenants-defendants.

In the Court of first instance, the tenants appeared, but the co-sharer landlords did not appear; and the Court found that the tenants-defendants had paid rent to defendant No. 4, agent or manager of the co-sharer landlords; and that they (the tenants), were thereby absolved from their liability to pay rent, and it passed a decree against defendant No. 4.

Against this decision, the defendant No. 4 preferred an appeal, and the Appellate Court held that the suit against defendant No. 4 was barred by limitation under Article 62. Against this decision the plaintiff preferred an appeal to the High Court, and Mr. Justice

Walmsely, holding that Article 62 applied, confirmed the judgment of the lower Appellate Court.

Against this decision of the High Court, the plaintiff preferred the present appeal under section 15 of the Letters Patent.

Babu Satish Chandra Ghosh, for the Appellants.—Defendant No. 4 did not appear in the Court of first instance. In that Court, he ought to have appeared and objected that the suit as against him was barred. He ought to have filed a written statement submitting that if it were found by the Court, that he had received rents from the tenants, then the suit against him was barred under Article 62. I submit that Article 62 is not applicable to the facts of this case, unless it is found as a fact that the defendant No. 4 received the money for the plaintiff's use. Refers to Mahomed Wahib v. Mahomed Ameer (1). It cannot be said without any evidence that the money was received by defendant No. 4 for the plaintiff's use. The defendant No. 4 was the manager of the family, and the money received by him as rent, might not be for the plaintiff's use. Before Article 62 was applied some questions of facts ought to have been gone into in order to arrive at the conclusion that the defendant No. 4 took the money for the plaintiff's use. But this was not done. The defendant No. 4 did not file any written statement and did not contest the suit. There was a suit for accounts pending against him, in which he filed a written statement alleging that he did not receive any rent for the plaintiff's use. The lower Court was not justified in applying Article 62 without finding on evidence taken for the purpose, that the rent received by defendant No. 4 was for the plaintiff's use. At any rate the case should be remanded to the lower Court for a finding as to whether the rent was received for the plaintiff's use or not.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak (with him Babu Amullya Kumar Guha), for the Respondent, was not called upon.

SATYA NARAYAN CHAKRAVARTY v. DWARKA NATH SADHU.

JUDGMENT.—In our opinion, there can be no room for controversy that the view taken by Mr. Justice Walmsley is amply supported by the authorities. The plaintiff instituted this suit for recovery of money in the alternative from two sets of defendants. He claimed arrears of rent from the tenant-defendants, and, alleged, at the same time, that if the entire rent had already been realised from them by his co-sharers, he was entitled to a decree as against the latter. This form of action is well known [Sham Singh v. Kishun Sahai (2), Aiyathurai Ravuthan v. Santha Meera Ravuthan (3), Yerukola v. Mudiya Kamudu (4)]. The Court of first instance found that the entire rent had been collected on the 4th November 1907 by the fourth defendant who was apparently the managing member of the family composed of the plaintiff and his co-sharers. The trial Court accordingly dismissed the suit against the tenant-defendants and made a decree against the fourth defendant. Thereupon the fourth defendant appealed and argued that the claim, as against him, was barred by limitation, inasmuch as the rent had been collected by him on the 4th November 1907 and the suit had not been instituted till the 18th April 1911. The Subordinate Judge gave effect to this contention and dismissed the suit. That decree has been affirmed by Mr. Justice Walmsley on second appeal to this Court.

It is plain that the case is governed by Article 62 of the first Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. That Article applies to a suit for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use. It is now well settled that this Article is applicable even though the defendant at the time when he received the money did not intend to pay it to the plaintiff; the operation of the Article is attracted if it is established that the money received by the defendant is money which belongs to the plaintiff and is re-payable to him in justice, equity and good conscience. In support of this proposition reference may be made to the case of Mahomed Wahib

v. Mahomed Ameer (1). The same view has been subsequently adopted in a long series of decisions and the rule embodied in Article 62 has been applied in a variety of cases more or less analogous in their circumstances to those of the case before us. We may mention the decisions in Subbanna Bhatta v. Kunhanna Banta (5), Shanmuga Pillai v. Minor Govindasami (6), Sankunni Menon v. Govinda Menon (7), Baiznath Lala v. Ramadoss (8) and Niader Singh v. Ganga Dei (9). In our opinion, Article 62 is applicable to this case, and as the plaintiff has not sought the protection of section 18 of the Indian Limitation Act on the allegation of fraud the suit has been rightly dismissed as barred by limitation. The appeal is consequently dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—The plaintiffs are proprietors of certain mouzas of which the principal defendants are lessees or mukarraridars under the plaintiffs, and the present suit is brought for the following reliefs:—

(1) That it may be adjudicated that the plaintiffs have a zemindari interest to the extent of 14 annas, 12 gandas in the mouzas mentioned in the Schedule appertaining to Taluks Jam Juri, Nagari and Chota Bara Asna and that the plaintiffs are in possession of the same.

(2) That it may be declared that the plaintiffs are entitled and are in possession of the sub soil of the said taluks and that the principal defendants have no right thereto.

In their written statement the defendants denied the rights of the plaintiffs to the sub-soil. They further contended that they were put in possession of the land by an order under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure made by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Jamtara on the 9th of May 1909.

The present suit was instituted before a Deputy Magistrate exercising the powers of a Subordinate Judge in that Sub-Division, but the plaint was returned to the plaintiffs on the ground that the suit was not maintainable because it had been laid under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, which was not in force in the Sub-Division. Thereupon the plaintiffs preferred the present second appeal on the ground that the order of the learned Subordinate Judge directing the plaint to be returned was wrong.

It is admitted by the plaintiffs that the suit is one for a mere declaration and that it falls within the four corners of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act of 1877. It is also admitted that the Act is one of those Acts which, by the terms of the Scheduled Districts Act of 1874, has been excluded from the District of Sonthal Parganas, of which the Sub-Division of Jamtara is a part. Therefore, it would seem that by section 3, clause 3, of Regulation III of 1872, rights created by the Specific Relief Act cannot be enforced in the Sub-Division of Jamtara. But then the learned Vakil for the appellants turns to Act XXXVII of 1855, section 2, of which enacts that for the trial and determination of suits exceeding Rs. 1,000 in value the General Laws and Regulations shall apply. He contends that the Specific Relief Act, being one of the general laws, applicable to India, and the present suit being valued at Rs. 8,000 he is by virtue of section 2 of Act XXXVII of 1855, read with section 3 of Regulation III of 1872, entitled to ask the Court to hold that section 42 of the Specific Relief Act does apply to the suit in question. The argument is a very ingenious one, but I am satisfied that it has no foundation. All that Regulation III of 1872 read with Act XXXVII of 1855 means is that in suits exceeding Rs. 1,000 in value those laws will apply which are proprio vigore in force in the whole of the British India. But on turning to the Specific Relief Act we find that it extends to the whole of the British India except to the Scheduled Districts as defined in Act XIV of 1874. The Sonthal Parganas being a Scheduled District within the meaning of Act XIV of 1874, it is clear that the Specific Relief Act does not proprio vigore extend to the Sonthal Parganas. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Specific Relief Act does not apply to the case before us.

Then the learned Vakil for the appellant falls back upon justice, equity and good conscience, and he relies upon a decision by a Divisional Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Janardan Mahato v. Bhairab Chandra Mondal (1), where their Lordships Chitty and Richardson, JJ., held that although the Specific Relief Act was not applicable to the Sonthal Parganas a prayer for specific performance of a contract could be granted upon the principles of justice, equity and good conscience. Whatever the merits of the case before their Lordships may have been, I am clearly of opinion that the principles of justice, equity and good conscience cannot require the declaration which the plaintiffs want here. The relief contemplated by section 42 of the Specific Relief Act is a highly technical form of relief which was introduced into this country in 1877. Previous to that declaratory reliefs could only be granted under the provisions of the Procedure Code of 1859 subject to a condition precedent that there were circumstances which might justify the grant of consequential relief. The law of 1877 has certainly given the Courts a new power but in my opinion the exercise of that power which is specially declared by the Statute to be discretionary ought to be jealously watched. It cannot, in my opinion, be in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience that we should apply principles which are the basis of a highly technical part of the Act to a locality which the Government of the country has expressly declared to be unfit for the operation of the Act. In my opinion the principles of justice, equity and good conscience do not require that we should make the declaration which the plaintiffs seek.

(1) 30 Ind. Cas. 365.

NIAZ ALI KHAN v. SHER.

The learned Vakil for the appellants finally asks us for leave to amend the plaint so as to make it a suit for consequential relief. In other words he desires to convert the present suit into a suit for recovery of possession and for injunction. I think that this case is one covered by the decision in Jhari Singh v. Pirthi Nath Sahu (2), and that we ought not, at this stage, to allow an amendment of the plaint, firstly, on the ground that no substantial injustice will be done by directing the plaintiffs to bring a fresh suit and, secondly, on the ground that having regard to the pleadings in this particular case the change sought to be made is a change of an unprecedented description within the rule in Newby v. Sharpe (3). The appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal, second—Finding of fact—Burden of proof, wrong view of allocation of—Punjab Courts Act (III of 1914), s. 41.

A wrong view of the allocation of the burden of proof is a good ground for setting aside a finding of fact in second appeal.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Jhelum, dated the 27th March 1914, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Jhelum, dated the 4th August 1913, decreeing the claim.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Appellants.

Khwaja Zia-ad-Din, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The Pleader for the defendants-respondents frankly admits that the Divisional Judge was in error in holding that in this case the initial burden of proof was shifted on to the plaintiffs to prove want of legal necessity; but he urges that great weight must be attached to the general considerations set forth in the judgment of the Divisional Judge from which the only reasonable inference that can be drawn is that legal necessity existed for the alienation in dispute. In my opinion it cannot properly be held, on the strength of the general considerations mentioned by the learned Judge, that the alienor was justified in making the alienation in question in 1911, though they may well be taken into account in deciding whether the burden of proof as to legal necessity regarding the alienation in dispute was not a light one.

As the learned Divisional Judge has decided the case upon a wrong view of the allocation of the burden of proof, I set aside his judgment and decree and remand the case to the District Judge for re-decision. Costs in this Court will be costs in the cause. Counsel's fee Rs. 16.

*Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92—
Management of trust—Court, discretion of—Custom—Sangat of Nank Shahi Udasis—Mahant, appointment of.*

In a suit under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, a Court has complete discretion in arranging for the management of a trust to which the section applies, although it is the duty of the Court to take into consideration such matters as the wishes of the founder (where these can be ascertained) and also the past history of the institution and the way in which the management has been carried on theretofore. [p. 180, col. 2.]

In the sangat of Nanak Shahi Udasi Sadhus at Benares the custom as to the appointment of a new Mahant is that the Mahant for the time being has the right to appoint a chosen disciple, or chela, to succeed him on his death. [p. 181, cols. 1 & 2.]

First appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Benares, dated the 16th March 1915.

Mr. Hari Bans Sahai, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. Sundar Lal and Messrs. Harendra Krishna Mukerji and Harnandan Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—These are two connected appeals arising out of two suits brought in the Court of the District Judge of Benares with regard to the administration of a public trust. There is in the city of Benares a sangat, or monastery, of Nanak Shahi Udasi Sadhus, which has appertaining to it certain immoveable property in the shape of land, houses and trees. The manager of the trust is the Mahant, or religious head of the society, and it is not denied that the office ordinarily descends to the chosen disciple, or chela, of the deceased Mahant. In the year 1910 certain persons interested in the management of the trust obtained the permission of the Legal Remembrancer to institute a suit under the provisions of section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the removal of the trustee and the preparation of a scheme of management. The trust property was then in the possession of Sadho Prakash as Mahant, and with him were associated two persons named Makund Prakash and Sewa Das. By a decree dated March 1st, 1911, the District Judge of Benares removed these persons from the management and appointed one Baba Bichittar Singh as trustee. There was an unsuccessful appeal against this decree, and finally Baba Bichittar Singh died in September 1913 without having obtained effective possession of the trust property. Two persons named Mahant Makund Singh and Baba Hari Das appear to have asserted independently some sort of claim to succeed as of right to the office conferred by order of the Court on Baba Bichittar Singh; but nothing effective was done, and the management of the trust remained in confusion. Under these circumstances two distinct applications were made to the Legal Remembrancer for permission to institute suits under the provisions of section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, in order to obtain fresh directions from the District Court regarding the management of the trust. The Legal Remembrancer probably found it difficult, on the materials before him, to draw any distinction between the two sets of applicants; and on March 17th, 1914, he passed two separate orders, one in favour of each of them.

Two suits were accordingly instituted in the Court of the District Judge of Benares. In Suit No. 2 of 1914, instituted in April 1915 of that year, the plaintiffs were Govinda Nand, Daya Nand and Atma Nand, all described as "Nanak Shahi Udasis", residents of Benares city. In Suit No. 3 of 1914, instituted on the 21st April 1914, the plaintiffs were Mahant Dharam Das and Saran Das, also described as "Udasis" and residents of Benares city. In each suit the defendants originally impleaded were Sadho Prakash, Makund Prakash and Sewa Das, the trustees removed from office under the decree of March 1st, 1911, the allegation being that they had continued in effective possession and management of the trust property, in consequence of Baba Bichittar Singh's failure to secure the benefits of the decree in his favour. In each suit the plaintiffs at a later stage impleaded Mahant Makund Singh and Baba Hari Das as persons claiming an interest in the matter through Baba Bichittar Singh deceased. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 3 of 1914 went a step further. It appears that, after the two suits had been instituted, a question was raised by Sadho Prakash and the original defendants as to whether this sangat at Benares was not to be regarded as dependent in some way on what has been described as a "parent institution" in the city of Amritsar. One Lachhman Prakash, as Mahant of a monastery at Amritsar, came forward to assert a right of interference in the affairs of the trust now in suit. He purported to make over the management to a body known as the Panchaiti Akhara of Udasi Sadhus. Documents were executed by Sadho Prakash on the 15th April 1914, and by Lachhman Prakash on 28th April 1914, purporting to give some sort of legal colour to these arrangements. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 3 of 1914 proceeded accordingly to implead, first, Lachhman Prakash of Amritsar, and secondly, a group of defendants understood to represent the Panchaiti Akhara. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 2 of 1914 refused to implead these persons, and resisted a contention that they were in any way necessary parties to their suit.

*See 40 Ind. Cas. 182.—Ed.

DHARAM DASS V. SADHO PRAKASH.

The District Judge has tried the two suits together, in the sense that they were regularly set down for hearing on the same dates. He has written identical judgments and passed practically identical decrees in the two suits. At the same time he has kept the suits distinct and separate in important respects. He has not impleaded the plaintiffs in Suit No. 3 as defendants in Suit No. 2, or vice versa. He has not merely repelled the contention that Lachhman Prakash of Amritsar and the representatives of the Panchaiti Akhara were necessary parties to Suit No. 2 of 1914, but he has not apparently even considered the question whether it might not be advisable for him to bring them on the record as persons "whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit," under the very wide powers conferred on the Court by the provisions of Order I, rule 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Finally, we have failed to discover on the record of either suit any formal order to the effect that evidence taken in the one suit may be treated as evidence in the other.

The identical decrees passed in two suits are to the following effect:—

(a) Govinda Nand, one of the plaintiffs in Suit No. 2 of 1914, is appointed trustee of the disputed trust in succession to Baba Bichittar Singh deceased, and the entire trust property has been declared vested in him.

(b) It is declared that all the other parties to both the litigations, including, therefore, the plaintiffs in Suit No. 3 of 1914 and those defendants to that suit who were not impleaded at all in Suit No. 2 of 1914, "be divested of any right or interest" in the trust property.

(c) Govinda Nand is directed to take possession of the singat and of the trust property, with a declaration that this right will descend to "his successors" after him; and there is a brief declaration as to the objects of the trust.

The effect of the procedure adopted in the Court below has been to land us in a perfect quagmire of legal technicalities. I may say at once that these could all have been avoided if the learned District Judge had made a free and intelligent use of his powers under Order I, rule 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure. I have no doubt that those powers ought to have been exercised in order to make the plaintiffs in Suit No. 2 of 1914 defendants in Suit No. 3 of 1914, and vice versa. It would also have been advisable for all the defendants finally brought upon the record of Suit No. 3 of 1914 to have been formally impleaded also in the connected suit.

In this connection I would add a further remark which may be found useful as a direction to District Courts in dealing with other suits of this nature. There can be no doubt that, in appointing a trustee in a suit brought under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the choice of the Court is not limited to the array of parties in the suit before it. The duty of the Court is to appoint the most suitable persons available, whether originally impleaded in the litigation or not. Nevertheless, I think that the person whom the Court proposes to appoint should always be formally impleaded as a defendant before the final decree is passed. The terms of Order I, rule 10, of the Civil Procedure Code are obviously wide enough to justify such an order. Indeed I am of opinion that the trial of the suit will always be simplified if the Trial Court, as soon as it has evidence before it suggesting a particular person as a suitable trustee, should call upon that person to file a written statement, expressing his willingness to accept the office and putting forward his own qualifications. All the parties concerned will then have timely notice of what is proposed to be done, and will not be able to contend in appeal that they were taken by surprise, or prevented from proving that the person eventually appointed to the trusteeship was not really qualified for the post. Moreover, the Appellate Court will not then be faced by the anomaly of having before it an appeal by an unsuccessful litigant against a decree in favour of a person who was not formally a party to the suit in the Court before.

In the two appeals now in question we were faced at the very outset by technical difficulties regarding the array of parties. First Appeal No. 222 of 1915 was filed by Mahant Dharam Das, the principal plaintiff in Suit No. 3 of 1914. He impleaded as respondents all the persons who had been on the record of that suit as defendants; but he did not implead Govinda Nand, the newly appointed trustee, though the whole object of his appeal was to obtain the reversal of that gentleman's appointment. He was naturally met at the outset by the objection that no order passed in an appeal to which Govinda Nand was no party could possibly have the effect of reversing the decree in Govinda Nand's favour. On the other hand, the connected First Appeal No. 249 of 1915 was filed by the representatives of the Panchaiti Akhara. The objection was at once taken that this appeal was technically an appeal against the decree in Suit No. 2 of 1914, to which suit these appellants had not been made parties at all.

We endeavoured to meet these difficulties in the first instance by formally adding as respondents to each of the appeals all the parties to the connected appeal not already impleaded in each case; but this did not altogether obviate further controversy as to the validity and legal effect of our order.

In considering the legal position of the parties, as the two records now stand before us for disposal, I do not think it necessary to invoke the principles laid down in Sir Dinshaw v. Sir Jamsetji (1) as to the general effect of decrees passed in suits under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, though I believe those principles to be sound. As regards the representatives of the Panchaiti Akhara I take it that they have appealed against the decree appointing Govinda Nand trustee of the property in suit. A decree to this effect was passed in Suit No. 3 of 1914, to which these persons were parties, as well as in Suit No. 2 of 1914, to which they were not parties. I am not at all sure that these appellants are themselves responsible for the fact that their appeal has been treated, in the preparation of the record, as one solely against the decree in Suit No. 2 of 1914. I put my point in this way: the appellants in First Appeal No. 249 of 1915 either have appealed against the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914, or they have not. If they have not, they remain bound by its terms; for it was a decree passed in a litigation to which they were parties, and within the competence of the Court to pass, even if Suit No. 3 of 1914 had been the only litigation before it. I am content to take it that these representatives of the Panchaiti Akhara are in substance appealing against both decrees, or at any rate are undoubtedly appealing against the decree which they could not afford to ignore, namely, the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914. The difficulty as to Govinda Nand's not having been formally impleaded in Suit No. 3 of 1914 I would lay aside as a mere technicality. I think there ought to have been an order formally adding him as a defendant in that suit; but I hold that when the Court below passed a decree appointing him trustee of the endowment, a decree which, I must repeat and insist upon the point, the Court was just as competent to pass in Suit No. 3 of 1914 as in Suit No. 2 of 1914, it did in effect make him a party to the former of these suits as well, to this extent at any rate that he ought to have been impleaded as a respondent in any appeal against the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914. I, therefore, regard the order of this Court adding Govinda Nand as respondent to First Appeal No. 222 of 1915 as one which it was within the competence of this Court to pass, and which removes any formal defect which there might otherwise be about the array of parties in this appeal.

I now proceed to deal with both these appeals on the merits, treating them, in the first instance, as if they were both of them appeals against the decree passed in Suit No. 3 of 1914. I propose to pass a separate order on First Appeal No. 249 of 1915, dealing with that appeal on the assumption that it can be regarded as an appeal against the decree in Suit No. 2 of 1914.

In the memorandum of appeal filed by Mahant Dharam Das there are nine paragraphs. The seventh contains an allegation as to the improper exclusion of evidence, which was not pressed in argument. The eighth attacks the declaration in the decree as to the objects of the trust in one small matter of detail; the point is of little importance, but it has not been shown to us that the decision of the Court below was wrong. In the ninth there is a suggestion that that the wording of the decree is defective and that it is not clear what the Court below meant by vesting the trusteeship in Govinda Nand and his successors. I have no doubt the District Judge meant that Govinda Nand would have the right to nominate a suitable disciple or chela to succeed him, just as the Mahant had always done during the previous history of the foundation.

The remaining pleas amount to nothing more than this, that Govinda Nand is not a fit and proper person to be trustee of this endowment, and that the appellant Dharam Das is. This question is complicated by somewhat vaguely worded pleas asserting the right of the appellant to be appointed, and suggesting that there has been no proper inquiry into "the custom and practice" of this monastery. In this connection it seems necessary to lay stress on the fact that there is no plea to the effect that the property in suit does not appertain to a "trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature", within the meaning of section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Of course the appellant Dharam Das could not possibly take this point; he was himself suing under that section. The pleadings of Lachhman Prakash of Amritsar and of the defendants representing the Panchaiti Akhara are perhaps a little ambiguous, but I do not find that the right of the Court to deal with all the property in suit under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure was ever definitely challenged. These suits must, therefore, be distinguished from all suits in which the position of the Mahant of a monastery, or similar association, has been claimed to be that of a "corporation sole," or in which the litigation has been between persons claiming as of right that the office of Mahant had vested in them and in which none of the parties concerned had invoked the provisions of section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code. The law applicable to suits under this section is laid down in the case of Mahomed Ismail Ariff v. Ahmed Moolla Dawood (2). The Court has "complete discretion" in arranging for the management of a trust to which this section applies. No doubt it is the duty of the Court to take into consideration such matters as the "wishes of the founder" (where these can be ascertained), and "also the past history of the institution and the way in which the management has been carried on heretofore;" but the question which we have to determine is merely whether there has been a proper exercise of discretion on the part of the Court below. That the said Court was within its jurisdiction in appointing Govinda Nand is simply beyond question.

Nor can any party be heard to plead any right purporting to be derived by any transfer or devolution from Mahant Sadho Prakash of a date subsequent to the decree of March 1st, 1911. The effect of that decree was finally to divest Sadho Prakash and the two defendants impleaded along with him of all title to the office of Mahant of this sangat, or to the management of this trust, and of all right to possession in respect of the trust property.

(2) 35 Ind. Cas. 30; 14 A. L. J. 741; (1916) 1 M. W. N. 460; 20 C. W. N. 1118; 20 M. L. T. 110; 18 Bom. L. R. 611; 31 M. L. J. 290; 24 C. L. J. 198; 4 L. W. 269; 9 Bur. L. T. 141; 43 C. 1085.

DHARAM DASS v. SADHO PRAKASH.

From the date of that decree nothing remained to Sadho Prakash which he could transfer to anybody else by deed, or which could devolve on any one else by virtue of any supposed relinquishment or surrender. Moreover, the decree of March 1st 1911 appointed a new trustee; it thus extinguished the right of any person to succeed by inheritance or under the custom of the institution, in the event of the death of Sadho Prakash or of his voluntarily vacating the office. There has in fact been no such vacating of the office by Sadho Prakash; he was removed by the decree of a competent Court, and it is sheer contumacy on his part to profess to be able to transfer the trusteeship, or to surrender it in favour of any other person, after the date of the decree.

Once these points are clearly apprehended there remains no force whatever in First Appeal No. 222 of 1915. The reasons given by the District Judge for refusing to appoint Mahant Dharam Das to the trusteeship are perfectly sound. The man was trying to run with the hares and hunt with the hounds. He actually accepted a deed of gift, dated February 1st 1913, from Sadho Prakash, and the learned Judge had, in my opinion, good reason for regarding him as belonging to the "same gang" as Sadho Prakash and his co-defendants. I strongly suspect his suit of having been largely collusive, at any rate to this extent that it was intended as a counterblast to Suit No. 2 of 1914, and was filed in the hope that in any event the management of the trust might be retained by the knot of dishonest trustees whom the decree of March 1st, 1911, was intended to displace. There is no force in the plea that Govinda Nand was disqualified from the office of Mahant by anything in the constitution of established customs of this sangat. The learned Judge has, in my opinion, shown due regard to the past history of the institution and the way in which the management had been carried on heretofore," when he decided that the thing most to be desired in the interests of the trust was the complete and final exclusion of Sadho Prakash and his friends from all concern with the management. As regards the "custom and practice" of the institution, the only custom established by reliable evidence is that the Mahant for the time being has the right to appoint a chosen disciple, or chela, to succeed him on his death. This custom could not be pleaded by any person claiming as heir to Sadho Prakash, for reasons already stated. If any party to the litigation could set up any arguable plea on the basis of this custom, it would be those defendants who claimed some sort of devolution from Baba Bichittar Singh, the trustee appointed by the decree of March 1st, 1911. These defendants have not appealed against the decree of the Court below, so that their case is not before us and need not be discussed.

I now pass on to consider the pleas taken by the appellants in First Appeal No. 249 of 1915, the representatives of the Panchaiti Akhara.

The one plea in their memorandum of appeal about which I have felt a certain amount of difficulty is the plea that their case was prejudiced by the procedure followed in the Court below. The suggestion is that, if they had been made defendants in Suit No. 2 of 1914, they could have produced evidence against the fitness of Govinda Nand for appointment as trustee, which they were precluded from producing by the procedure actually followed. I have come to the conclusion that there is no real substance in this plea. It seems to me that these appellants, as defendants in Suit No. 3 of 1914, had every opportunity of supporting the case set up by them, and that this case has been rightly decided against them on the merits. In view of the manner in which the two suits were conducted in the Court below, it is absurd to suggest that these appellants did not know that Govinda Nand was a candidate for appointment as trustee, or that a decree so appointing him could lawfully be passed in Suit No. 3 of 1914 as well as in Suit No. 2 of 1914. They never took up the position that the Mahantship was in fact vacant, and that they were prepared to put forward one of their own body as a preferential candidate for the office of Mahant, with claims superior to those of Govinda Nand.

They came into the litigation under the wing of Lachhman Prakash, the Mahant from Amritsar, and their written statement requires to be considered along with him. It is interesting to notice that Lachhman Prakash endeavoured to conceal the fact that he had taken a deed of transfer from Sadho Prakash. He certainly had no arguable case on the basis of that deed of transfer, but it does not seem to me that he even attempted to set up such a case. What he said was that he himself, as Mahant of an institution known as the Chitta Akhara of Amritsar, was the true head of the sangat at Benares and manager of the trust in suit. He represented the local Mahant at Benares as a mere agent of his own, appointed by him and removable at his pleasure. He alleged that he had, in the exercise of his lawful authority, removed Sadho Prakash from the management and made over the same to the Panchaiti Akhara. The present appellants, as representatives of this institution, simply associated themselves with the above pleas. They have been decided against the appellants by the learned District Judge, and the case against them is, in my opinion, overwhelming. There is no evidence worthy of consideration of the alleged subordination of the Mahants of the Benares Sangat to the so called "parent institution" at Amritsar. In the suit decided in March 1911 Lachhman Prakash, though cognizant of the proceedings, never set up any such plea, but on the contrary came forward as a candidate for appointment by the Court, in the event of its removing Sadho Prakash. If it were necessary, I should even be prepared to hold that the point is concluded against Lachhman Prakash by the decree of March 1st, 1911.

I think the learned District Judge has taken a substantially correct view of the effect of this previous litigation on the present suits. I have said enough to dispose of all the points taken in the memorandum of appeal now under consideration. The plea that the Court below was mistaken in holding that the office of Mahant became vacant on the death of Baba Bichittar Singh might have required consideration, if it had been put forward by persons claiming to be his heirs and successors under the custom of the institution. In the mouth of the present appellants it does not mean that the office has vested de jure in any such heir or successor, but that Bichittar Singh (in spite of the decree in his favour) was never the Mahant of this institution, and that Lachhman Prakash was all along the true Mahant. The objections taken by the present appellants to the appointment of Govinda Nand are substantially those taken in the other appeal. If the plea had been taken that the learned District Judge had acted irregularly in basing his decree (appointing Govinda Nand) in Suit No. 3 of 1914 partly on the strength of evidence recorded in Suit No. 2 of 1914, it would have required consideration. It could never, in my opinion, have been more than a question of form; but it has not been taken at all in appeal, and we are under no obligation to discuss it.

I would, therefore, dismiss First Appeal No. 222 of 1915 with costs, including fees on the higher scale. I would add to the same decree a direction that, if First Appeal No. 249 of 1915 be regarded as an appeal against the decree in Suit Nos 3 of 1914, and in so far as it is susceptible of being so regarded, it do also stand dismissed, the question of the costs of that appeal being reserved for a separate order and a further decree which I propose to pass on the record of that appeal itself.

WALSH, J.—See my judgment delivered to-day in the connected First Appeal No. 249 of 1915.*

BY THE COURT.—This appeal is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale. It is also directed that if the connected First Appeal Nos. 249 of 1915 be regarded as an appeal against the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914, and in so far as it is susceptible of being so regarded, it do also stand dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—This appeal is in substance covered by the orders passed in First Appeal No. 222 of 1915*. I think these appellants were placed in a difficulty by the procedure followed in the Court below, and that it is not easy to say whether the present appeal is to be treated as one against the decree in Suit No. 2 of 1914 or against the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914, or both. I have made it clear that these appellants are bound, and must remain bound, by the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1914, as confirmed by this Court in appeal. In view of this fact it is of little practical importance what orders are passed in respect of the decree in Suit No. 2 of 1914. In my opinion that decree is open to formal objection in that it contains a direction that the parties to Suit No. 3, including those not impleaded at all in Suit No. 2, "be divested of any right or interest" in the property in suit. I have stated that the procedure followed in the Court below was, in my opinion, faulty; but having adopted that procedure, the learned District Judge should have been consistent. My order would be that the words "as well as in Suit No. 3" be removed from the decree passed in Suit No. 2 of 1914; but to avoid all possibility of misunderstanding, I would add to the decree of this Court a declaration that nothing in this decree must be deemed to affect or to modify in any way the decree passed in First Appeal No. 222 of 1915, or the rights or liabilities of any of the parties concerned under the decree of the Court below in Suit No. 3 of 1914.

I am quite aware that in modifying in any way the decree passed in Suit No. 2 of 1914 we must necessarily disregard the objection that the present appellants, not having been made parties to that suit, have technically no right of appeal against that decree. A sufficient answer to this would be that the modification may be treated as made in the exercise of the revisional jurisdiction of this Court.

As regards costs, I would leave the appellants in this appeal to bear their own costs in this Court and in the Court below, permit Swami Govinda Nand to recover his costs from the trust property, and affirm the order of the Court below leaving all other parties to bear their own costs.

WALSH, J.—I agree. There are no merits in this appeal nor for that matter in the other. I think the view contended for by the Panchayati Akhara in this Court is inconsistent with the attitude adopted by them at the hearing of the suit. The Judge below has come to a reasonable conclusion on the facts and I see no reason for differing from him. He seems to have taken great pains to find out what is best for the trust and to have given every one concerned a full hearing. The orders now proposed are sufficient to correct any defect in the form of the proceedings in the Court below. I should have been prepared to go further and to add a direction that those in possession be ordered to hand over possession of all trust property in their possession to the successful plaintiff, even though no appeal was before us on this point. It is not so much a question of the rights of the parties as giving effect to the real decision of the Court in a matter of serious public concern. It seems to me anomalous, to say the least of it, that a fresh suit should have to be brought to enforce the order of the Court in a matter of this kind. In such cases the provisions of the law ought to be, and, in my opinion, are strong enough to compel actual physical compliance with the decision arrived at. As a matter of interpretation and by analogy to the established practice of the Chancery Court in England administering trusts, the words "such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require", which are expressly inserted in section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cover every subsidiary order or direction on any matter of detail necessary for carrying out the main purposes of the section. This has been clearly recognised in Bengal where the High Court with original jurisdiction has necessarily to consider this matter more frequently than in the High Court in this Province. Vide Sajedur Raja Chowdhuri v. Gour Mohun Das Baishnav (1).

*See 40 Ind. Cas. 177—Ed.

Further, where more than two suits in a matter of this kind have been sanctioned by the Legal Remembrancer and are brought to trial, although with different parties, in the same Court, at the same time, on the same subject-matter, under the same circumstances and for the same kind of relief, a Judge has clearly power under the Code to consolidate the suits, that is to say, for the purpose of the hearing to merge them into one and treat them as one for all practical purposes. That is in substance what this learned Judge did with the tacit consent of those who appeared before him, representing the different parties. In my opinion if he had made an express order to the same effect even without the consent of the parties, he would have been acting clearly within his jurisdiction and would have been taking what is obviously a convenient course. This view is supported by two very careful judgments, one by Mr. Justice Woodroffe in Hukum Chand Boid v. Kamalanand Singh (2) and the other by Mr. Justice Mookerjee in Nand Kishore Singh v. Ram Golam Sahu (3), with every word of which I agree.

BY THE COURT.—The decree of the Court below passed in Suit No. 2 of 1914 is modified ed to the extent that the words "as well as in Suit No. 2" appearing in the said decree are directed to be removed, with a declaration added thereto to the effect that nothing in the said decree must be deemed to affect or modify in any way the decree passed in First Appeal No. 22 of 1915, or the rights or liabilities of any of the parties concerned under the decree of the Court below in Suit No. 3 of 1914.

The appellants do bear their own costs in this Court and in the Court below. Swami Govinda Nand is permitted to recover his costs from the trust property, and the order of the Court below leaving all other parties to bear their own costs is affirmed.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs-appellants against the defendants-respondents in which they sought to obtain a declaration to the effect that they were entitled to

(1) 24 C. 418; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 946.

(2) 33 C. 927; 3 C. L. J. 67.

(3) 18 Ind. Case. 207; 40 C. 955 at p. 959; 16 C. L. J. 508.

PALANIAPPA CHETTY v. PALANIAPPA CHETTY.

"graze and rest their cattle in, and to take wood from Rakh Majheran of village Sagur," and an injunction directing the defendants-respondents not to obstruct them in the exercise of the said rights. The Primary Court framed the following issue: "Does the right of easement, as alleged by plaintiffs, exist in respect of the area in dispute?" and after a consideration of all the evidence produced by the parties and an examination of the wajib-ul-arz of the village came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had established their rights and decreed the claim with certain reservations. Both the parties were dissatisfied with the decree as passed and preferred appeals to the learned Divisional Judge, who held that out of the plaintiffs appellants only those, five in number, who were residents of Tika Majheran, were entitled to the rights claimed. He accordingly dismissed the suit in so far as the other plaintiffs-appellants were concerned and granted a modified decree in favour of the aforesaid five persons. In the decree so granted he made certain provisions with regard to the exercise of those rights with which we are not now concerned. Against the decree of the lower Appellate Court the plaintiffs-appellants have preferred this second appeal through Mr. Sohan Lal and we have heard Mr. Tek Chand on behalf of the respondents.

An objection has been taken to the appeal as it stands on the ground that the appellants, Ghebru and Jai Kishen, had no authority to prefer an appeal on behalf of the five persons who reside in Tika Majheran and that inasmuch as the grounds of appeal are not common, Order XLI, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, cannot be applied. Mr. Sohan Lal admitted that he had received instructions only from Ghebru and Jai Kishen and not from the five residents of Tika Majheran. In these circumstances we must hold that the said five persons had not authorised this appeal and cannot, therefore, be regarded as appellants.

With regard to the remaining plaintiffs-appellants Mr. Sohan Lal urged that the Courts below have wholly misunderstood the case and that the issue framed and tried did not cover all the claim. He alleged that his clients did not claim an easement over the land within the meaning of section 26 of the Indian Limitation Act but that they based their claim on custom. As a matter of fact no objection was taken to the issue either in the primary Court or in the grounds of appeal to the lower Appellate Court, and the issue is clearly wide enough to cover the question of custom. A reference to the judgments of the Courts below also establishes the fact that an enquiry into the custom alleged had been made. Mr. Sohan Lal also admitted that all the available evidence, documentary or oral, had been produced by both sides. It is clear that the parties have in no way been prejudiced by the form in which the issue was settled, and they clearly understood what the point at issue between them was, viz., whether there was a custom by which the plaintiffs-appellants were entitled to graze and rest their cattle in Rakh Majheran and to cut wood therefrom. Mr. Tek Chand then raised the further objection that inasmuch as the question for decision was one relating to the existence of a custom this appeal could not be entertained for want of a certificate. Mr. Sohan Lal was constrained to admit the correctness of this objection. It is clear that the question involved in the case was one of custom and Mr. Tek Chand's objection, therefore, has force.

We accordingly reject this appeal with costs payable by the plaintiffs-appellants other than the five who reside in Rakh Majheran.

Appeal rejected.

In this case the Subordinate Judge passed, what he calls, a judgment on the 25th February 1916 in which he expresses the opinion that a Receiver should be appointed, and which he concludes by saying: "The petition shall stand adjourned....." The same day an order in the terms of the judgment was issued. Against this order an appeal has been preferred to this Court. It is admitted that up to the date of the presentation of the appeal no Receiver was appointed. Mr. T. R. Ramachandrier has taken the preliminary objection that no appeal lies, as under rule 1, clause (1) (a) of Order XL, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, the order is not complete until a proper person is appointed Receiver. He is supported in this contention by Narbadashankar Mugatram v. Kevaldas Raghunathdas (1) and Upendra Nath Nag Chowdhry v. Bhupendra Nath Nag Chowdhry (2); on the other hand, this view will be to a certain extent inconsistent with the Full Bench decision of this Court in Venkatasami v. Stridavamma (3), which holds that against the order refusing to appoint a Receiver there is an appeal. If an order refusing is covered by rule 1, clause (1) (a) of Order XL, which corresponds to section 503 (a) of the old Code, it is difficult to contend that the order which makes a pronouncement that a Receiver should be appointed is not within the rule. The decision in Venkatasami v. Stridavamma (3) was accepted as good law in Sangappa v. Shirbasawa (4) and in Cursetji Dinshaw Bolton v. Gangaram Limbaji Gaikwad (5) and was not dissented from by the other High Courts.

The practice of this Court, to which the learned Advocate-General drew our attention, is in accordance with the view that an appeal lies against the conclusion to appoint a Receiver, though no specific person is appointed.

There is another view which we are inclined to adopt. The pronouncement of the Court that a Receiver should be appointed should be regarded as an interlocutory statement, and until a person is appointed, there is no final order under rule 1 of Order XL. If we are right in this opinion, the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to issue an order on his conclusion that a Receiver should be appointed. Our inclination is, if this position is correct, to set aside the order as having been passed without jurisdiction, and to direct the lower Court to pass fresh orders on the petition.

However, as the questions are not free from doubt and as there are pronouncements of the other Courts which are seemingly inconsistent with the view of the Full Bench in this Court, we submit for the opinion of the Full Bench the following questions:—

(a) whether the pronouncement of the Subordinate Judge that a Receiver should be appointed is a final order as contemplated by Order XL, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code;

(b) and, if so, whether such an order is appealable?

This appeal coming on for hearing as per above order, on 30th October 1916, upon perusing the said Order of Reference and the material papers in the suit and upon hearing the arguments of the Counsel on both sides and the question having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court expressed the following

OPINIONS.

SRINIVASA AIYANGAR, J.—The substantial question referred to us for determination is whether an order determining that it is just and convenient to appoint a Receiver, i.e., an order for the appointment of a Receiver, and before a particular person is selected and appointed as such Receiver, is appealable.

The right of appeal is conferred by clause (s) of Order XLIII, which provides inter alia that an appeal shall lie from an order under rule 1 of Order XL; and that rule, omitting the portions not material for the present purpose, is in these terms: "where it appears to the Court to be just and convenient, the Court may by order (a) appoint a Receiver." The question is whether the order referred to above is an order under this rule.

When an application is made for the appointment of a Receiver, the most important question for determination is whether it is just and convenient to appoint a Receiver in the circumstances, and if the Court comes to the conclusion, that it is not shown to be just and convenient to appoint a Receiver, it must dismiss the application. This determination is made under rule 1, and there can be no doubt that that order is appealable. It was so decided in Venkatasami v. Stridavamma (3) on the construction of the corresponding provision of the old Code and as pointed out in Cursetji Dinshaw Bolton v. Gangaram Limbaji Gaikwad (5), the same construction must be placed on the similar provision in the new Code. The same view has been adopted in Allahabad in the recent case of Muni Lal v. Jagan Nath (6). But these decisions do not throw much light on the present question, for it can easily be contended that orders declining to appoint a Receiver and orders appointing a Receiver are exhaustive of the category of orders contemplated by rule 1, as the discretionary power to appoint a Receiver, conferred by that rule, includes the power to reject an application for such appointment, and nothing more. This was apparently the view taken by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in Cursetji Dinshaw Bolton v. Gangaram Limbaji Gaikwad (5). The above rulings, however, emphasize the fact that the right of the appeal is not restricted to any particular kind of order under rule 1 and an appeal lies against all orders under that rule.

That an order determining that it is just and convenient to appoint a Receiver is an order, can, I think, scarcely admit of doubt; and the practice of the English Courts by which first an order is made for the appointment of a Receiver in Court, leaving the selection of the person to be appointed to be settled in Chambers, is conclusive of the question. The determination is, I think, more than 'a mere interlocutory statement', if that phrase means an expression of opinion, for there can be no doubt that the Court which determined that it was necessary to appoint a Receiver cannot change it of its own accord without a review or other proper proceeding. I also think that the Subordinate Judge in this case, on his determination that a Receiver should be appointed, was entitled to issue an order. In Nothard v. Proctor (7) the order appealed against appears to be an order for the appointment of a Receiver and not an order appointing a particular person as Receiver and no question was raised that it was not a judgment or order. If it is an order, the order is certainly one under Order XL, rule 1, as the Court determines the question of the necessity for the appointment of a Receiver under this order. Reference was made to section 94 of the Code as conferring the power to appoint a Receiver, but it is to be observed that that power can be exercised only if rules provide for such exercise and in accordance with those rules.

Even if I am wrong in this, and if the orders under Order XL, rule 1, can only be of two classes, one rejecting applications for Receivers, and the other, orders appointing Receivers. I agree with the contention of the learned Advocate-General that an order for the appointment of a Receiver is as much an order 'appointing a Receiver,' as an order naming a particular person as Receiver. In England an appeal is allowed without leave from an order appointing a Receiver and I can find no restriction of the right, in the decided cases, to cases where a Receiver is named in the order of the Court, or to orders passed in Chambers appointing a particular person. In a majority of cases, the appeal will be directed against the determination that it is necessary to appoint a Receiver rather than against the particular person appointed, as the person to be appointed is very often a matter of agreement between the parties. This construction may, no doubt, lead to a multiplicity of appeals as was pointed out in Narbadashankar Mugatram v. Keraldas Raghunathdas (1), but I do not see how that can be avoided in any view; for instance one man may be appointed Receiver, and after appeal filed, he may resign and another appointed. In fact the learned Pleader who argued that the order was not appealable said that if after an appeal, the person appointed as Receiver resigned or ceased to be Receiver, the appeal abated, though the grounds of appeal may have been solely directed to challenging the necessity for the appointment of any Receiver. On the other hand, I do not see any purpose in compelling a party to wait till the Receiver is appointed and if, as held in Srinivas Prosad Singh v. Kesho Prosad Singh (8) the appointment is not complete till the Receiver has completed the security, till such completion. If the order of appointment is discharged by the Appellate Court all the expense incurred in giving security will be thrown away. In Perry v. Oriental Hotels Company (9), where there was first an order by the Vice-Chancellor ordering the appointment of a Receiver and an order in Chambers appointing a particular person, L. J. Gifford, in appeal, though he discharged the order appointing the particular person, directed the successful appellant to pay the costs of the recognizances, remarking that the appellant should have come to the Court of Appeal before the recognizances were entered into.

There may again be a difficulty in ascertaining the date of appointment of a Receiver and the date may become important for calculating the period of limitation for appeal. The order appointing a named person as Receiver may appoint him Receiver and direct him to give security within a limited time, or may make the appointment conditional on giving security (Seton, Form No. 5, page 727, No. 1, page 767). In the former case if the person appointed does not give the security he may cease to be Receiver and any appeal presented in the meantime would become useless. In the latter case on security being completed no further order may be passed except the issuing of a warrant of appointment. The English practice appears to be, not to pass or enter the order till the security is completed: Ridout v. Fowler (10), but under the code procedure in the mofussil there is no such practice. In such a case what is the date of the order appointing a Receiver? In some cases and for some purposes on the completion of the security the appointment relates back to the date when it was made. Kerr on Receivers, page 163.

From the Forms printed in Seton, it will be seen that an 'order appointing a Receiver' includes an order directing that a proper person be appointed Receiver, as well as an order appointing a named person (cf. Forms Nos. 13 and 19 with Nos. 16, 20, 28, section 1, Chapter XXXII). It is not, therefore, improper to speak of an order 'for the appointment of a Receiver' as an order 'appointing a Receiver' within the meaning of Order XL, rule, 1.

It has been the practice of this Court to allow appeals from these orders and I see no sufficient reason to hold that on the construction of the relevant rules and Orders this practice is illegal.

A different view has been taken in Calcutta first by Chitty and Richardson, JJ., in Mathuria Debi v. Shib Dyal Singh Hazari (11), where the learned Judges purported to follow the decision in Birajan Kooer v. Ram Churn Lall Mahata (12), which was an appeal against an order or expression of opinion by a Subordinate Judge submitting the name of a person to be appointed as Receiver under section 505 of the old Code. The order appointing a Receiver had to be made under section 503 and under section 588 an appeal was allowed only against orders under section 503.

Section 505 of the old Code is now repealed and with all respect, the order appealed against in Birajan Kooer v. Ram Churn Lall Mahata (12) has nothing in common with the order in the present case. In Upendra Nath Nag Chowdhry v. Bhupendra Nath Nag Chowdhry (2) Mookerjee and Teunon, JJ., held that an order not appointing a named person as Receiver is not appealable and the learned Judges came to that conclusion on the ground that an appeal lies only from a final order appointing a Receiver; and in the later case of Srinivas Prosad Singh v. Kesho Prosad Singh (8) Mookerjee, J., delivering the judgment of the Court explained that there is no final or appealable order in cases where security is required from the Receiver, before the completion of the security. With all respect I am unable to accept this interpretation of the rule, for the reasons which I have already given. In Bombay the view of the Calcutta High Court has been adopted in Narbada-shankar Mugatram v. Kevaldas Raghunath-das (1). Though the learned Judges came to the conclusion that an order for the appointment of a Receiver is an order and also an order under Order XL, rule, 1, yet for the purpose of appeal, only an order appointing a particular person is an order under rule 1. As an order rejecting an application for Receiver would also be appealable as an order under rule 1, the Bombay High Court, as I have already said, apparently holds that only two kinds of orders fall within the category of orders under Order XL, rule 1. I am not sure this is right and in any event I am not able to adopt the construction placed on the words 'order appointing a Receiver.'

In Ramji v. Koman Das (3) Chamier and Piggott, JJ., appear to take the same view, though as pointed out in the judgment, the order under appeal there was peculiarly worded.

In the face of such weighty authority against my construction of the section, I venture to express my opinion with great diffidence; but having come to a clear conclusion in the matter, and seeing that the question involved is really a question of practice which can be changed if necessary by the High Courts by rules, I would answer the questions referred to us as follows:—

- (a) The pronouncement of the Subordinate Judge that a Receiver should be appointed is an order under Order XL, rule 1 and
- (b) is appealable under Order XLIII, clause (s).

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—I agree in the conclusion arrived at by Srinivasa Aiyangar, J.

SPENCER, J.—I am of opinion that an appeal is premature if preferred before a Receiver has been appointed by name, for the reason that until that is done the order is merely interlocutory and does not completely dispose of the petition to appoint. At first sight it would appear impossible to contend that when a Court decides that a Receiver should be appointed but does not appoint, the order of the Court is one appointing a Receiver. It is, however, argued that if an order refusing to appoint which is passed without naming a person is appealable, an order directing a Receiver to be appointed without naming any one for the appointment must also be appealable. I cannot see that this is a logical consequence. The difficulty seems to have arisen out of (13) 27 Ind. Cas. 646; 13 A. L. J. 79.

PALANIAPPA CHETTY V. PALANIAPPA CHETTY.

he rulings which have decided that a refusal to appoint is appealable as an order made under Order XL (1) (a). This declares, "where it appears to the Court to be just and convenient, the Court may by order appoint a Receiver of any property whether before or after decree." When a Court altogether refuses to appoint a Receiver there is no question of the person to be selected as Receiver, and the proceedings have reached a further stage of finality than they have when a pronouncement is made that a Receiver must be appointed without appointing any one. A refusal to appoint necessarily disposes of the application to appoint but the other order does not do so. This may be seen from the instance out of which this reference has arisen. The Subordinate Judge, after recording his opinion that a Receiver should be appointed, adjourned the petition for a week to consider the questions (1) who should be appointed Receiver and (2) what instructions ought to be given him. It is easily conceivable that in certain circumstances there might be no objection to the appointment of a Receiver and yet there might be strong objections to the particular person selected for the office, as when one of the parties to the suit is made a Receiver. In other cases the opposing party may be indifferent to the personality of the nominee and may take his stand entirely on the question whether the occasion is a fit one for taking the control of the property out of the hands of the person in possession. I doubt whether it can have been the intention of the Legislature to allow two appeals, one from the first decision as to the need of a Receiver and another from the final order appointing a definite person by name to the office. It seems to me that such a procedure would involve a multiplicity of proceedings, a result which it is always desirable to avoid where possible. No one who wishes to appeal can complain of having to wait till a Receiver is actually selected, as the interval between the decision to appoint and the selection of an individual is unlikely to be long and in practice the Courts should generally be able to make them both simultaneous. If there is an interval, nobody's interests are prejudiced by waiting, as possession of property cannot be transferred until it is known who is to take it over.

An order that a Receiver should be appointed is in fact not an order that can be put into operation until some one is actually appointed.

I should, therefore, hesitate before attributing to the Legislature an intention to provide rights of appeal against incomplete and ineffective orders, even if the literal wording of the Code were not also against such a construction.

I am not much impressed by the next argument which is based on the tentative character that an order of appointment bears until security is actually furnished by the person appointed.

Whatever may be the practice in English Courts, the practice in India is to appoint a Receiver subject to his giving security to the satisfaction of the Court. Not only is there nothing forbidding this practice but the form of the warrant prescribed in Appendix F, Form 6, of the Code of Civil Procedure shows the practice to be correct. This warrant cannot be issued until an individual has been selected, as it is to be addressed by name to the person appointed in these words:—"you are hereby (subject to your giving security to the satisfaction of the Court) appointed Receiver," etc.

Of necessity the order of appointment must precede the giving of security, for till then it is not known who must give it and what is its extent. But an order is not the less a final order because it is conditional. Of course if a person appointed does not furnish security as directed, it may be necessary for the party applying for a Receivership order to put in a fresh petition nominating another person. The Court will not act in the matter without being moved. On the fresh application being admitted, the Court will consider it and pass orders, and this will naturally give rise to a fresh right of appeal. The costs incurred in giving security will usually be trifling in this country in the mofussil and at any rate they are incidental to the proceedings.

I am thus of opinion that the matter of furnishing security has no bearing on the questions before us, and with due respect I consider that the case of Srinivas Prosad Singh v. Kesho Prosad Singh (8), which decided that the order of appointment of a Receiver must date from the date of the person appointed giving the required security, is not good law under the present Code of Civil Procedure. If the date of appointing a Receiver by name subject to his giving security be taken as the date from which to calculate the time for preferring an appeal under Order XLIII, rule 1 (s), then there will be no difficulty in ascertaining the date, as my learned brother Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., apprehends, for such appointments are made in open Court by the Courts in India and are dated on their pronouncement.

I may also observe that the Code contains another indication that such matters are intended to be subsidiary to the main order, in that no appeal is provided against directions under Order XL, rules 2 and 3, relative to the remuneration to be paid to and the security to be furnished by a Receiver appointed under rule 1 of the same order.

I will now proceed to consider the reported cases. On the point we have to decide, they are all one way. In this High Court alone there is hitherto no reported case directly on the point.

It has been decided in Calcutta in Upendra Nath Nag Chowdhry v. Bhupendra Nath Nag Chowdhry (2) and in Mathuria Debi v. Shib Dyal Singh Hazari (11) that the making of a Receivership order without nominating the Receiver is an interlocutory order and not appealable.

In Bombay and Allahabad the same conclusion has been reached in Narbada-shankar Mugatram v. Kevaldas Raghunath-das (1) and Ramji v. Koman Das (13).

The cases of Venkatasami v. Stridavamma (3) which overruled Subramanya Chetti v. Appasami Nayak (14) and of Sangappa v. Shivbasawa (4) and of Cursetji Dinshaw Bolton v. Gangaram Limbaji Gaikwad (5) deal with a different question, viz., whether an order refusing to appoint a Receiver is appealable. The learned Judges considered the effect of a decision come to by a Subordinate Court under section 505 of the old Code, which finds no place in the present Code. So far as they involve the principle that a mere determination to appoint a Receiver is not appealable, these cases support the view taken by me.

As regards the non-appealable nature of interlocutory orders, Srinivas Prosad Singh

v. Kesho Prosad Singh (8) is also to the same effect, but as already observed, it goes too far in treating conditional appointments as inoperative and, therefore, not final orders.

As the practice in England of first making an order in Court for the appointment of a Receiver and afterwards settling in Chambers who is to be appointed, differs from the practice of Indian Courts of appointing Receivers by name in open Court, we cannot get much assistance from English cases or from English books of reference. In India in matters of procedure Courts are governed by the Code. The answer to the reference must, therefore, simply depend on the interpretation to be placed on the language of the Order in the Code of Civil Procedure.

Instances have been cited in which this Court has heard appeals in cases where no Receiver had at the time of appeal been appointed by name; but when no objection was raised to the maintainability of the appeal, these can be no guide as to what the law is on the subject.

I agree with the opinion expressed by the two learned Judges who made the reference and with the decisions of the Calcutta, Allahabad and Bombay High Courts, and I would answer both questions referred to us in the negative.

Reference answered in the affirmative.

GANGADARA MUDALI v. SAMBASIVA MUDALI.

First appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge, Jaunpur, dated the 15th January 1916.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Appellant.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from an order of remand. The suit was on a mortgage. The contesting defendant, who is a transferee from the original mortgagor, put the plaintiff to proof of the execution and of the validity of the deed in suit, as well as of the passing of the consideration. The first Court held that the execution of the deed was proved, but it was not proved that it was attested by two witnesses as required by section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. The lower Appellate Court has held that the attestation by two witnesses was proved. If this had come before us as a clear finding of fact on the part of the lower Appellate Court, it is doubtful whether we could have interfered with it, but the learned Subordinate Judge arrives at his conclusion by a method of reasoning which is apparent from the judgment itself. He admits that no witness deposed that the mark of the executant Phagu, by which the said Phagu, being illiterate, purports to have executed the deed in suit, was affixed to the document in the presence of the said witness. There is no evidence on the record to that effect. The learned Subordinate Judge says that it is proved, by a witness named Makhdum Bakhsh, that the signature of the executant Phagu was appended to this document by the scribe of the document at Phagu's request, and he refers to the case of Deo Narain Rai v. Kukur Bind (1) as proving that this is sufficient execution. As a matter of fact the document with which we have to deal in the present case does not purport to have been executed by the scribe's writing the name of Phagu, on behalf of Phagu, at the request of the said executant. It distinctly purports to have been executed by Phagu's affixing his mark to the same. What follows below the mark is merely a statement, certified as being in the handwriting of the scribe, to the effect that the above is the mark of Phagu and that the said Phagu admits having executed the deed in question and received the consideration therefor. In the absence of any evidence that Phagu's mark was affixed to this document in the presence of any witness, the finding of the lower Appellate Court seems to be an impossible one. The decision of the first Court is right. We allow this appeal, set aside the order of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the Court of first instance with costs here and in the Court below. Costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

SAMBASIVA MUDALI—PLAINTIFF—
RESPONDENT.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 77—'Refusal to register', meaning of—Suit to enforce registration—Jurisdiction of Court—Limitation.

An order of a Registrar refusing to accept a document for registration on the ground that it was time-barred, is a 'refusal to register' within the meaning of section 77 of the Registration Act, and entitles the aggrieved party to sue for the enforcement of registration under the section. [p. 193, col. 2.]

There is no substantial distinction between refusal to accept a document for registration and a refusal to register within the meaning of section 77 read with sections 76 and 72. [p. 193, col. 2.]

Narasimha Nayanavaru v. Ramalingama Rao, 10 M. L. J. 104; Sivarama Pattar Kariakar v. Krishna Iyer, 23 Ind. Cas. 23; 23 M. L. J. 307; 15 M. L. T. 233, followed.

The time for filing a suit under the section should be computed from the date of the appellate order of the Registrar refusing to register under section 72 or section 76, and not from the date of any prior order refusing to extend time. [p. 193, col. 2.]

Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 113 of 1914 (O. S. No. 71 of 1913 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruturaipundi).

FACTS of the case appear from 34 Ind. Cas. 769.

Mr. A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, for the Appellant.—The Act clearly draws a distinction between “accepting a document for registration” and “registering.”

[ABDUR RAHIM, J.—I cannot conceive what possible difference there could be between “refusal to accept for registration” and a “refusal to register.”]

The Act clearly draws such a distinction between accepting a document for registration and registering. Sections 23 to 27 prescribe the time for presentation for registration. Sections 28 to 31 describe the place of registration. Sections 32 to 36 Part VII-Part XI describe merely the preliminary process for registration. It is only after all these preliminaries are complied with that the duties of the Registering Officers commence. The duty of Registering Officers commence only from section 58. It is only when he records a “refusal to register,” that an appeal will lie to the District Registrar and against such an order a suit will lie. In this case what happened was that the document was not admitted for registration. It is simply a preliminary act of the Sub-Registrar whether to accept it or not. He refused to accept it. It is only when the procedure prescribed in sections 58 to 63 is complied with that there can be a refusal to register. The following cases clearly support my view. Gangava v. Sayava (1), Kunhimmu v. Viyyathamma (2), Balambal Ammal v. Arunachala Chetti (3) and Veeramma v. Abbiah (4).

Mr. K. S. Ramabhadra Aiyar (Amicus Curæ).—The order is in effect one to refuse to register. Though the preliminaries are to be complied with by the Sub-Registrar, it is a part of his duty and his order directing to apply for extension of time is a refusal to register. Narasimha Nayanevaru v. Ramalingama Rao (5), Sivarama Pattar Kariakar v.

Krishna Iyer (6) and Kudrathi Begum v. Najibunnessa (7) clearly support my view.

JUDGMENT.—We agree with Seshagiri Aiyar, J., that this case falls within section 77 of the Registration Act. This is in agreement with the interpretation adopted by our Court in Narasimha Nayanevaru v. Ramalingama Rao (5) and Sivarama Pattar Kariakar v. Krishna Iyer (6), and we also may point out that the rules framed under the Act are in accordance with this view.

A contrary view, it is true, has prevailed in Gangava v. Sayava (1), but the fallacy of the reasoning in that case, if we may say so with respect, lies in thinking that there is any substantial distinction between refusal to accept a document for registration and a refusal to register within the meaning of section 77 read with sections 76 and 72. Here the District Registrar did in fact refuse to direct registration of the document and nonetheless so because he made no enquiry as to whether the document was executed or not, proceeding on the ground that the document was in his opinion presented out of time.

We may mention that a ruling referred to at the Bar as Kunhimmu v. Viyyathamma (2) can be distinguished on the ground that the appeal to the Registrar in that case having been presented after the expiry of the prescribed period, it was considered as if there was no appeal and admittedly where there has been no appeal to the Registrar, no suit will lie under section 77. There are also some observations in Balambal Ammal v. Arunachala Chetti (3) and Veeramma v. Abbiah (4) which might be taken to support the interpretation put upon section 77 in Gangava v. Sayava (1), but they are in the nature of obiter dicta.

It is also argued that the suit is barred. But time should be computed from the order of the Registrar dated 1st February 1913, when on appeal he refused to direct the registration, and not from his previous order refusing to extend time.

The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SHIVLAL MOTILAL v. BIRDICHAND JIVRAJ.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.
ORIGINAL CIVIL JURISDICTION SUIT No. 1450
OF 1915.

February 3, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Macleod.
Raja Bahadur SHIVLAL MOTILAL—PLAINTIFF

versus

BIRDICHAND JIVRAJ AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 233, 43—Principal and agent—Agent personally liable—Principal, undisclosed—Suit against agent—Suit, subsequent, against principal, whether maintainable—Interpretation of Statutes—Illustration to section, value of.

A plaintiff who has a right to sue both an agent and his principal under section 233 of the Contract Act is not competent, after he has sued one of them to judgment, to sue the other in a second suit. [p. 199, col. 2.]

Section 233 of the Contract Act enacts substantive law, laying down who shall be held liable, and not adjective law, defining the procedure by which the liability may be enforced. This section merely creates a joint liability so that judgment may be obtained against both principal and agent. [p. 196, col. 2; p. 197, col. 2.]

The illustration to section 233 shows that the words "hold them both liable" mean that the party dealing with the agent can join both the agent and the principal in one suit, and there is no suggestion that if he does so he is only entitled to a decree against one or the other and not against both. [p. 197, col. 2.]

Section 233 of the Contract Act gives the party dealing with an agent who is personally liable a double form of election. He can choose between suing both principal and agent jointly or electing to sue one of them. So that in any case if he sues one to judgment a suit against the other will be barred. But if he sues both and one consents to judgment that cannot be a bar to his continuing the suit against the other. [p. 199, col. 2.]

The real effect of section 43 of the Contract Act, is to deprive a co-contractor sued alone of his right to have his co-contractor joined with him in the action. It enables the plaintiff to get a decree against the one if he does not wish to or will not join the other; it does not enable him to file separate actions against both. It does not deprive the second co-contractor of his right to plead the previous judgment, or split up one cause of action into as many causes of action as there are joint contractors. [p. 199, col. 2.]

Case-Law discussed.

The proper course in the construction of a Statute is in the first instance to examine the language of the Statute and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. [p. 196, col. 1.]

The Indian Contract Act does not profess to be a complete code dealing with the law relating to contracts. It purports to do no more than to define and amend certain parts of that law. [p. 196, col. 1.]

An illustration to a section ought never to be allowed to control the plain meaning of the section itself and certainly it ought not to do so when the effect would be to curtail a right which the section in its ordinary sense would confer. [p. 196, col. 1.]

Mr. Inverarity (with him Mr. Strangman, Advocate-General, and Mr. Desai), for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kanga (with him Mr. Jinnah), for Defendant No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are no longer in dispute. In June 1913 the plaintiff advanced a large sum of money to one Bansidhar Mungtumal on the security of 2,000 shares in the Specie Bank. As the market rate for the shares was falling the plaintiff called upon Bansidhar to pay margin. On the 6th October 1913, Rs. 12,000 were paid as margin and in November, 295 shares of the Bank were handed to the plaintiff by way of further margin. These shares were not transferred into the plaintiff's name. The plaintiff sold 185 shares which were transferred into the name of the purchasers. Transfers signed by the Bombay Merchants Bank as vendors and by the plaintiff as purchaser for 100 shares were lodged with the Bank so that the shares might be transferred to the plaintiff's name. Transfers for the remaining 10 shares were not signed by the plaintiff.

On the 29th November 1913, an order was made for the winding-up of the Bank.

On the 6th February 1914, the plaintiff filed a suit against Bansidhar for the amount due on the account between them and for a declaration that the said Bansidhar was bound to indemnify the plaintiff against all liability in respect of the uncalled amount of capital on the shares pledged.

On the 20th February, Bansidhar was adjudicated insolvent.

On the 9th June, a decree was passed in plaintiff's favour for Rs. 82,924-8-7 with costs and further interest and the defendant was ordered to indemnify the plaintiff against any calls that might be made by the Official Liquidator on the said 2,000 shares.

No dividend has been declared or is likely to be declared by the Official Assignee on the estate of Bansidhar. After this decree had been passed, the plaintiff discovered that Bansidhar had been acting as the agent for the present first defendant.

He had also had to pay to the Official Liquidator the sum of one lakh in respect of a call made on the contributories of the Bank under an order of the Court.

He filed this suit on the 23rd December 1915 against Birdichand Jivraj and the Official Assignee praying (1) that the first defendant might be ordered to pay the said sum of Rs. 82,924-8-7 with interest from the 9th June 1914 and the costs of the suit filed against Bansidhar.

(2) That the first defendant might be ordered to pay the said sum of one lakh with interest.

(3) That the first defendant might be ordered to indemnify him in respect of all calls he might be required to pay in respect of the 110 shares.

(4) That the first defendant might be ordered to pay the costs of an order made by the Insolvency Court granting leave to join the Official Assignee as a party to the suit.

The first defendant in his written statement denied that Bansidhar was his agent.

However, it was proved, in a similar suit filed by the Standard Bank against Birdichand, that Bansidhar was acting as the first defendant's agent; and the first defendant's Counsel when issues were raised conceded this.

It was also held by the Appeal Court in that case that in the absence of a contract the Standard Bank was not entitled either to an indemnity in respect of calls to be made or to a decree for the amount actually paid in respect of a call.

I must, therefore, hold that the plaintiff is not entitled either to recover from the first defendant the said sum of one lakh or to an indemnity in respect of any amount he may have to pay in respect of the said 110 shares.

The real issue in the case is whether the plaintiff, having sued Bansidhar to judgment in Suit No. 172 of 1914, is entitled to maintain this suit against the first defendant.

The same point was raised in the suit filed by the Standard Bank. But it was proved in that case that the Standard Bank had before obtaining judgment asked Birdichand whether Bansidhar had been acting as his agent and he had replied in the negative. I held that Birdichand, having by a false denial prevented the Standard Bank from making their election, could not then claim that the Bank had made their election and my decision has been confirmed in appeal: Birdichand Jivraj v. Standard Bank (1).

I also expressed an opinion on the true construction of section 233 of the Indian Contract Act in favour of the Standard Bank but the question has been very much more elaborately argued before me and I shall deal with it without regard to that opinion. Section 233, which comes under the heading 'Effect of Agency on Contracts with Third Persons', says:—

"In cases where the agent is personally liable, a person dealing with him may hold either him or his principal, or both of them, liable.

Illustration.

A enters into a contract with B to sell him 100 bales of cotton, and afterwards discovers that B was acting as agent for C. A may sue either B or C, or both, for the price of the cotton."

Under section 230 an agent is not personally liable in the absence of any contract to that effect. Such contract is presumed to exist—

1. Where the contract is made by an agent for the sale, or purchase of goods for a merchant resident abroad.

2. Where the agent does not disclose the name of his principal.

3. Where the principal though disclosed cannot be sued.

Mr. Jinnah has argued that section 233 codified what was the law in England. And in this connection it may be noted that Messrs. Pollock and Mulla in their commentary on the Indian Contract Act do not even suggest that the section enacts anything different from the common law of England, while Messrs. Cunningham and Shephard dismiss the suggestion as improbable.

(1) 40 Ind. Cas. 167; 19 Bom. L. R. 341.

If the Legislature intended to codify the common law the wording of the section taken together with the illustration is most unhappy, but I am not concerned with what the Legislature intended to do. The question is, what have they done? In Norendra Nath Sarcar v. Kamalbasini Dasi (2), the following passage from the judgment of Lord Herschell in Bank of England v. Vagliano (3) was quoted with approval:—

"The proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the Statute and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view."

It may also be noted that the Indian Contract Act does not profess to be a complete code dealing with the law relating to contracts. It purports to do no more than to define and amend certain parts of that law: Irrawaddy Flotilla Co. v. Bugwandas (4). Now the natural meaning of the words "a person dealing with him (the agent personally liable) may hold both of them (agent and principal) liable," is to create a joint liability so that judgment may be obtained against both principal and agent. The illustration only goes so far as to show that the agent and the principal may be joined in one suit, but an illustration ought never to be allowed to control the plain meaning of the section itself and certainly it ought not to do so when the effect would be to curtail a right which the section in its ordinary sense would confer: Ameer Ali, page 100. It must be remembered that it was only under Order XVI, rule 4, of the Supreme Court Rules framed after the passing of the Judicature Act that it became permissible to join defendants alternatively liable in the same suit. That rule was reproduced in section 29 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 and is now represented by Order I, rule 3, of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908.

Section 233 enacts substantive law, laying down who shall be held liable, and not adjective law, defining the procedure by which the liability may be enforced. But it has been argued that the section follows the words of Willes, J., in Calder v. Dobell (5) decided in 1871, which was the leading case on the subject when the Contract Act was passed and must, no doubt, have been before the minds of the framers of the Act.

The plaintiff had entered into a contract with a broker called Cherry whom he knew to be acting as agent for a principal. Under pressure Cherry disclosed the name of his principal Dobell but put his own name to the contract at the plaintiff's request. In a suit on the contract against Dobell it was contended that Cherry having signed the contract parole evidence could not be admitted to show that there was a principal behind him, or in the alternative that the plaintiff had elected to hold Cherry liable by getting him to sign the contract. Both these contentions were overruled. On the second Willes, J., said:—

"I do not agree with Mr. Holker that two persons cannot be severally liable on the same contract. The question is whether there was anything in the circumstances of this case to negative or exclude the liability of both principal and agent, or to substitute the liability of the latter for that of the former... There is nothing to prevent the seller from insisting upon having both principal and agent liable to him at the same time, with the additional advantage of knowing the principal's name at the time."

On appeal, Kelly, C. B., said:—

"The contract was made in the name of Cherry, the agent: but the case shows that it was made on behalf of a principal who was named at the time. I think the plaintiffs had a right to sue either the agent or the principal, at their election. No doubt, the election being once determined, there is an end of the matter; as, where the agent has been sued to judgment."

From this it would appear that a suit against Cherry and Dobell would have been bad. A suit against one would have been a bar to a suit against the other and so far an election but until judgment was obtained the election was not determined, it would have been open to the plaintiff to file a suit against the other if the first suit was either dismissed, see Raman v. Vairavan (6) or discontinued: Priestly v. Fernie (7). In Morel Brothers v. Earl of Westmoreland (8) the plaintiffs sued husband and wife for the value of goods supplied to the wife. The wife confessed judgment under Order XIV and the plaintiffs were held to be debarred from proceeding against the husband. Lord Davey said:—

"I am disposed to think that if the proof had established a joint liability, the plaintiffs would not have been prejudiced by signing judgment under Order XIV against one of the joint debtors.... But if the proof which they tendered at the trial shows, not a joint debt by the two, but an alternative claim against one or the other, then I think that by signing judgment against one they have, on the principle of Scarf v. Jardine (9), elected to take their remedy against that one, and cannot afterwards sue the other who is not jointly but alternatively liable."

Lord Halsbury said:—

"The plaintiffs might have sued either the agent or the principal.... The result was that the plaintiffs got judgment against the agent. They cannot get judgment against the principal also. It is an alternative remedy; it cannot be made available against the two."

(9) (1882) 7 A. C. 345; 51 L. J. Q. B. 612; 4 L. T. 258; 30 W. R. 893.

Now the illustration to section 233 shows that the words 'hold them both liable' mean that the party dealing with the agent can join both the agent and the principal in one suit, and there is no suggestion that if he does so he is only entitled to a decree against one or the other and not against both.

There is all the difference between saying that the party dealing with the agent can have the principal liable at the same time so that he can sue either the one or the other, which was the only procedure available in 1872, and saying that he may hold both agent and principal liable and sue both together. Whatever the Legislature may have intended, it appears to me that words "may hold both of them liable" mean that both may be sued to judgment in one suit.

But Mr. Desai wishes me to go further than this: he has argued that the words "may hold both of them liable" place the agent and the principal in the position of joint promisors and, therefore, that under section 43 the party dealing with the agent may sue either the agent or the principal to judgment and if the judgment is unsatisfied proceed against the other.

This brings me to that most debated question whether section 43 did place joint promisors in the same position as joint and several promisors or whether it merely took away the right of a joint debtor to be sued jointly.

In Hemendro Coomar Mullick v. Rajendrolall Moonshee (10), it was held that a decree obtained against one of several joint makers of a promissory note was a bar to a subsequent suit against others. This was followed by the High Court of Madras in Gurusami Chetti v. Samurti Chinna Manner Chetty (11). In Muhammad Askari v. Radhe Ram Singh (12), however, Strachey, C. J., held that a judgment obtained against some of several mortgagors and remaining unsatisfied was not a bar to a second suit against other joint mortgagors.

SHIVLAL MOTILAL v. BIRDICHAND JIVRAJ.

Previous to that the Bombay High Court had assumed the doctrine in King v. Hoare (13) to be applicable in Lukmidas Khimji v. Purshotam Haridas (14) and Laksmishankar Devshankar v. Vishnuram (15), and in Dick v. Dhunji Jaitha (16) the decision of Strachey, C. J., was considered by Crowe, J., who came to the conclusion that section 43 merely took away the right of a joint debtor to be sued jointly and to plead in abatement. On the other hand there is an obiter dictum of Farran, J., in Motilal Bechardas v. Ghellabhai Hariram (17) that section 43 appears to make all contracts joint and several.

As a Court, therefore, of first instance, I should not be prepared to differ from previous decisions of this Court. Strachey, C. J., came to the conclusion that the rule in King v. Hoare (13) and Kendall v. Hamilton (18) was not applicable to India because its basis was the right of a joint debtor to have all his contractors joined in a suit to enforce the joint obligation, and as that right was excluded by section 43 the basis of the doctrine was absent and the rule became inapplicable. But with due respect that was not the ground given for his decision by Parke, B., in King v. Hoare (13) for he said at page 503:—

"The matters of form being disposed of, the question is reduced to one of substance, whether a judgment recovered against one of two joint contractors is a bar in an action against another.

"It is remarkable that this question should never have been actually decided in the Courts of this country....

"If there be a breach of contract, or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a Court of Record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage; and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, 'transit in rem judicatum,'—the cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher. This appears to be equally true where there is but one cause of action whether it be against a single person or many."

"If there be a judgment against one of two joint contractors and the other is sued afterwards, can he plead in abatement, or not? If he cannot, he would be deprived of a right by the act of the plaintiff, without his privity or concurrence, in suing and obtaining judgment against the other. If he can, then he may plead in bar the judgment against himself, and if that be not a bar, the plaintiff might go on, either to obtain a joint judgment against himself, and his co-contractor, so that he would be twice troubled for the same cause, or the plaintiff might obtain another judgment against the co-contractor, so that there would be two separate judgments for the same debt."

In Kendall v. Hamilton (18), Wilson & McLay and Hamilton were partners. Kendall had contracted with Wilson unaware of the existence of a third partner and having sued Wilson and McLay to judgment, that judgment was held to be a bar to a suit against Hamilton.

It was certainly the opinion of a majority of their Lordships that the question was one of law and not of procedure.

Lord Hatherley said:—

"The remark was quoted as having been made by a very eminent Judge, that this rule which was adopted in King v. Hoare (13) was entirely a rule of procedure. I do not take that view..."

The basis of the decision in King v. Hoare (13) was still more forcibly pointed out by Lord Blackburn:—

"But King v. Hoare (13) proceeded on the ground that the judgment being for the same cause of action, that cause of action was gone. Transit in rem judicatum, which was a bar, partly on positive decision, and partly on the ground of public policy, that there should be an end of litigation, and that there should not be a vexatious succession of suits for the same cause of action. The basis of the judgment was that an action against one on a joint contract was an action on the same cause of action as that in an action against another of the joint contractors, or in an action against all the joint contractors on the same contract."

Lord Selborne said:—

"Upon the legal question, I understand it to be the opinion of all your Lordships, that a second action cannot be maintained upon a cause of action which has once passed in rem judicatum; and that this principle is not affected by any of the changes of procedure introduced by the Judicature Acts."

The judgment of Strachey, C. J., appears to be founded on a dictum of Bowen, L. J., in Hodgson, In re Beckett v. Ramsdale (19):—

"The common law principle that a judgment recovered against a joint debtor is a bar to a further action to be prosecuted against another joint debtor is explained at length in the case of King v. Hoare (13). There is in the cases of joint contract and joint debt, as distinguished from the cases of joint and several contract and joint and several debt, only one cause of action...The rule is by no means a technical rule. It is based, rightly or wrongly, on the idea that a joint debtor has right to demand, if he pleases, that he shall be sued at one and the same time with all his co-debtors. To enforce this right he is only entitled to plead in abatement, but the right is one of considerable business value, and is so recognized by the law."

With the greatest respect it appears as if this dictum is at variance with the passages I have just cited from the judgments in Kendall v. Hamilton (18).

It would seem that the occasion for the rule being laid down was the failure of the first joint debtor on being sued to exercise his right to plead in abatement, with the result that the cause of action was merged in the judgment. There was no cause of action left on which the second joint debtor could be sued. How the second joint debtor on being sued could raise the defence of merger would be one of procedure. He might plead in abatement, and as the joint debtor could not be joined owing to the joint creditor having proceeded to judgment this plea would be successful, or as stated by Parke, B., he might plead the previous judgment in bar of judgment against himself.

In my opinion the real effect of section 43 was to deprive a co-contractor sued alone of his right to have his co-contractor joined with him in the action and it enabled the plaintiff to get a decree against the one if he did not wish to or would not join the other; it did not enable him to file separate actions against both. It could not have been intended to deprive the second co-contractor of his right to plead the previous judgment, or to split up one cause of action into as many causes of action as there were joint contractors.

But even assuming it did, I very much doubt whether the same argument could be applied to section 233 which, if my construction is correct, appears to give the party dealing with an agent who is personally liable a double form of election. He can choose between suing both principal and agent jointly or electing to sue one of them. So that in any case if he sued one to judgment a suit against the other would be barred. But if he sued them both and one consented to judgment, that would not be a bar to his continuing the suit against the other: Dick v. Dhunji Jaitha (16) and Morel Brothers v. Earl of Westmoreland (8).

Finally it has been argued that the plaintiff, not being aware of the existence of a principal whom he could hold liable, could not be said to have had a chance of making an election. This appears to be conclusively answered by the decision in Kendall v. Hamilton (18), the only difference in the facts of that case being that Wilson and McLay were agents for the undisclosed principals, namely, themselves and Hamilton and not for Hamilton only.

Lord Cairns said:—

"I think that when the appellants sued Wilson and McLay, and obtained judgment against them, they adopted a course which was clearly within their power, and to which Wilson and McLay could have made no opposition, and that, having taken this course, they exhausted their right of action, not necessarily by reason of any election between two courses open to them, which would imply that, in order to an election, the fact of both courses being open was known, but because the right of action which they pursued could not, after judgment obtained, co-exist with a right of action...against another person. If Wilson and McLay had been the agents, and Hamilton alone the undisclosed principal, the case could hardly have admitted of a doubt; and I think it makes no difference that Wilson and McLay were the agents and the undisclosed principals were Wilson, McLay and Hamilton."

(19) (1886) 31 Ch. D. 177; 55 L. J. Ch. 241; 54 L. T. 223; 34 W. R. 127.

Adopting Lord Cairns' words, it is only by the fortunate accident of Birdichand being a solvent party that the plaintiff finds that he has a solvent principal of whom he was unaware. He did not contract with Birdichand except as an undisclosed principal, and this undisclosed person, with whom he entered into no agreement that he knew of, turns out afterwards to be liberated in consequence of the plaintiff not having taken steps to ascertain who were the contracting parties when he was bringing the action. The plaintiff having advanced the moneys looked to Bansidharas the man who should repay, but he has since discovered another person whom he thinks he may sue.

As regards the second defendant I think he should not have been joined. I find all the issues in favour of the first defendant.

The plaintiff must pay the costs of the first defendant, except the costs of the issue whether the first defendant was the principal. The first defendant must pay the costs of the plaintiff on this issue.

Suit dismissed.

Rent-free under-proprietary holding—Resumption suit, whether maintainable—Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), ss. 107G, H, E, 108, cl. (5A)—Declaratory suit against order passed under Chapter VIIA, maintainability of—Civil Courts, jurisdiction of—State, right of, to produce of soil in place of cash for payment of revenue, scope of—U. P. Land Revenue Act (III of 1901), ss. 79, 234—Determination of amount payable to proprietor—Revenue Board, powers of, to make rules—Rule 1, Cir. No. 63 of 1863.

An under-proprietary holding, whether rent free or otherwise, being heritable and transferable, is, by its very nature, not capable of resumption. When it is rent free, the remedy of the superior proprietor is to apply to the Settlement Officer to have it assessed to rent under section 79 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act, unless the assessment is barred by a previous judicial decision or otherwise. If it is assessed to rent, and the rent is not regularly paid, the superior proprietor can only bring it to sale in execution of a decree for his arrears but cannot eject the under-proprietor. [p. 203, col. 1.]

The Revenue Board has power under section 234 to frame rules, laying down the manner in which the rent is to be determined, but it has no power to exclude any class of under-proprietors, whether paying rent or not, from the operations of section 79, for section 234 does not permit the Board to frame rules inconsistent with the U. P. Land Revenue Act, and section 79 does not recognize rules other than those relating to the determination of rent. The suggestion made in rule 18 that where no rent is reserved, a superior proprietor can apply to resume the rent-free under-proprietary holding, is not, therefore, justified by the provisions of section 234 or 79 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act; and in so far as it excludes rent-free under-proprietors from the operation of section 79, is devoid of any legal authority. [p. 203, col. 2.]

The propriety of an order of a Revenue Court granting or refusing under-proprietary rights under section 107H of the Oudh Rent Act, according as the conditions laid down there are satisfied or not, cannot be challenged in a Civil Court. But a declaratory suit on the ground of a pre-existing under-proprietary right in the presence of an adverse order of the Revenue Court is maintainable in the Civil Courts. [p. 205, col. 2.]

The conditions contained in rule 1 of Circular No. 63 of 1863 that groves planted by proprietors should, after the village has passed out of their hands, be deemed to be their under-proprietary holdings, if they have remained in possession of them, should be proved in each case, and cannot be inferred from uncertain data. [p. 205, col. 1.]

SHANKAR SAHAI v. GAJADHAR PRASAD.

The principle underlying the resumption or assessment is that the State is entitled by the ancient law of the country to a certain amount of the produce of the soil, for which revenue payable in cash has now been substituted, and it cannot be deprived of the same by any action of the owner of the soil, and that the latter is similarly entitled to recoup himself from the occupier or actual cultivator, unless the effect of the recoupment is to stultify his own contracts for valuable consideration. [p. 202, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Sub Judge, Unao, dated the 8th May 1916, upholding that of the Munsif, (South) Unao, dated the 9th August 1915.

Messrs. Bisheshar Nath and Ram Bharosey Lal, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The dispute in this case relates to land, forming part of No. 904, old khasra, corresponding with Nos. 1319-2, 1319-3 and 1319-4, new khasra. The land was at one time occupied by a grove and was held rent free. The trees were cut from the portion in dispute about 43 years ago, and that portion has since then been in the cultivation of the plaintiffs and their predecessors-in-title without any payment of rent to the defendant, who is the superior proprietor of the village in which the said land is situated.

On the 3rd November 1911, the present defendant instituted a suit against the present plaintiffs in the Revenue Court (Exhibit 13) for the resumption of the land or for the assessment of rent thereon under section 108, clause 5 (A), of the Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886). The Assistant Collector held that the present plaintiffs had acquired under-proprietary rights therein under section 107H of the said Act (Exhibit 12). His decision was upheld on appeal by the Deputy Commissioner, but reversed by the Commissioner, who came to the conclusion that the said land was held by them as tenants and could be assessed to rent under section 107G of the Act (Exhibit A1). The present plaintiffs then appealed to the Board of Revenue, but were unsuccessful. The Junior Member of the Board was of opinion that they had acquired under-proprietary rights under section 107H, but the Senior Member took the view that section 107H did not apply to a suit for assessment of rent under the last clause of section 107E of the Oudh Rent Act (Exhibit 1).

In the Revenue Court, the present plaintiffs had pleaded that they were the proprietors of the land occupied by the grove and had, at all events, under-proprietary rights therein. In the present suit they similarly pleaded that they were the owners of the land in suit and had also acquired an adverse title thereto by continuous possession from more than 12 years. They sought a declaration that they were the absolute proprietors of the said land, that the judgment and decree of the Board of Revenue, assessing rent on the same, were null and void, and that they had in any case under-proprietary rights in the same. The Courts below found that the plaintiffs had under-proprietary rights in the land in dispute, and repelled the contention of the defendant that an order passed by the Revenue Court under Chapter VII (A), assessing rent on the land, could not be challenged in the Civil Court. They accordingly passed a decree, declaring that the plaintiffs were under-proprietors and not mere tenants of the said land, and that the order of the Board of Revenue did not affect their rights.

It is disputed that an order, passed by the Revenue Court, resuming rent-free land or assessing it to rent, can be challenged in the Civil Court, if the person against whom the order was passed claims to be the superior proprietor of the land resumed or assessed, for it is obvious that no question of resumption or assessment can arise, if it is occupied by the superior proprietor himself. In the unreported case of Ram Ghulam v. Gaya Prasad (1) which was followed in Matai Singh v. Ajudhya Singh (2), suits by so-called muafi holders, claiming full proprietary rights in the land, on which rent had been assessed by the Revenue Court, were entertained and considered. It is also not disputed that a suit for a declaration that a certain person was or was not an under-proprietor was, as held in Ram Pargash v. Raja Partab Singh (3) and Mohammad Abul Husan Khan v. Prag (4), ordinarily maintainable in the Civil Court.

SHANKAR SAHAI v. GAJADHAR PRASAD.

The question for consideration in this case is whether a person, claiming to be an under-proprietor, holding the land rent free, can contest the order of a Revenue Court, assessing him to rent as an ordinary tenant under section 107G of the Oudh Rent Act, in the Civil Court. Section 107B declares that all land, held rent free or at a favourable rate of rent, shall be liable to resumption or assessment or enhancement of rent, unless the holder establishes that he held the land under a grant, sanctioned by the Governor-General in Council or Chief Commissioner, or under a Judicial decision, passed prior to the 1st day of January 1902, or acquired it rent free or at a favourable rate of rent for a valuable consideration, previously to the commencement of the Oudh Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1876), and the right to resume which had previous to the commencement of the said Act not been barred by time, provided among other things that nothing in that section shall apply to any grants to which the provisions of section 79 of the North Western Provinces and Oudh Land Revenue Act, 1901, are applicable. Section 79 of the United Provinces Act, III of 1901, lays down that in Oudh, after declaring the assessment of a mahal, the Settlement Officer shall, in accordance with the provisions of the Oudh Sub-Settlement Act, 1886, so far as they are applicable, and subject to the rules made under section 234, determine the rent to be paid by all under-proprietors in a mahal, whether holding a sub-settlement or not, and by all holders of heritable, non-transferable leases, holding under a judicial decision. Section 79 makes no distinction between rent-free under-proprietors and under proprietors paying rent, and it follows that the provisions relating to resumption, assessment or enhancement or rent-free holdings in the Oudh Rent Act do not apply to grants held by under-proprietors, on whom rent can be assessed at the time of the settlement under section 79. The principle underlying the resumption or assessment is that the State is entitled by the ancient law of the country to a certain amount of the produce of the soil, for which revenue payable in cash has now been substituted, and cannot be deprived of the same by any action of the owner of the soil, and that the latter is similarly entitled to recoup himself from the occupier or actual cultivator, unless the effect of the recoupment is to stultify his own contracts for valuable consideration or previous decrees. But the methods provided by the law for the assessment of rents on under-proprietors and on other rent-free holders are different.

The learned Counsel for the defendant-appellant contends that section 79 was not applicable to under-proprietors, holding land rent free, and relies in support of that contention on rule 18 of the rules framed by the Board of Revenue for the guidance of Settlement Officers in Oudh in determining rent under that section, and the decisions of the Board of Revenue in Ram Datt Tiwari v. Court of Wards, Ajodhya Estate (5) and Lachmi Narain v. Special Manager, Nimgaon Estate (6). The above rules were apparently framed under section 234, clause (J) of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act, which authorized the Board to frame rules for the guidance of Collectors and Settlement Officers in fixing rent under that Act. Rule 13 of the said rules provides that the rent of under-proprietary holdings must be determined with reference to the assets and revenue of the holding; and that it was not allowable to enhance the rent in proportion to the increase of revenue in the entire mahal, as was sometimes done. Rule 17 states that when a holding consisted at the last settlement of groves or other uncultivated plots, on which no revenue was assessed or rent imposed, and the holding or a portion of it had since been brought under permanent cultivation and assessed to revenue, rent should be fixed on the cultivated land at an amount equal to the revenue assessed thereon with an addition of 10 per cent.; and that in no other case, rent was to be imposed on an under-proprietary holding, which was held rent free under a decree. Rule 18 then goes on to say: "In some districts there are numerous holdings, which have been entered in the register of under-proprietary tenures, though they were not created by a decree of Court, but owe their origin to private arrangements. The ownership of fields has been transferred by sale or deed of gift; or a proprietor, when parting with his entire share in a village, has reserved the ownership of certain plots as sir. Where the agreement was that the possessor of the plot should pay the revenue assessed on them, the possessor should be treated as a proprietor and revenue should be separately assessed on the plots. When the agreement was that the plots should be held rent free, or on payment of rent, the tenure so created is under-proprietary. The custom of carving out an under-proprietary tenure is a very ancient one in Oudh, and is the origin of much of the rent-free under-proprietary sir now in existence. In cases when there is an agreement to pay rent, the rent is liable to re-adjustment under the preceding rules. When no rent was reserved the holding must be treated as a rent-free grant, and like other under-proprietary rentfree holdings be recorded as rent free. It is for the superior proprietor to apply, if he thinks fit, to resume the rent-free grant. In the case of rent-free plots, above described, the Settlement Officer will record the amount of revenue payable on account of the plots, so that in the event of default by the superior proprietor, there may be no difficulty in enforcing the joint responsibility of the possessor under section 142 of the Revenue Act." (Board's Circular No. 2).

It does not appear what the Board of Revenue meant when they suggested that where no rent was reserved, it was for the superior proprietor to apply, if he thought fit, to resume the rent-free grant, for an under-proprietary holding, whether rent free or otherwise, being heritable and transferable, is, by its very nature, not capable of resumption. If it is rent free, the remedy of the superior proprietor is to apply to the Settlement Officer to have it assessed to rent, unless the assessment is barred by a previous judicial decision or otherwise. If it is assessed to rent, and the rent is not regularly paid, the superior proprietor can only bring it to sale in execution of a decree for his arrears: A superior proprietor has no right to eject an under-proprietor, and in that respect an under-proprietary holding differs materially from other rent-free holdings. The decisions of the Board of Revenue in Ram Datt Tiwari v. Court of Wards, Ajodhya Estate(5) and Lachhmi Narain v. Special Manager, Nimgaon Estate (5) seem to imply that section 79 of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act was not applicable to rent-free under-proprietors, but such an interpretation would be opposed to the express language of the section, which makes no exception and provides that a Settlement Officer shall determine, in accordance with the provisions of the Oudh Sub-Settlement Act, XXVI of 1886, and the rules framed by the Board of Revenue under section 234, the rent payable by all under-proprietors. The Board has power under section 234 to frame rules, laying down the manner in which the rent is to be determined, but it has no power to exclude any class of under-proprietors, whether paying rent or not, from the operation of section 79, for section 234 does not permit the Board to frame rules inconsistent with the Act, and section 79 does not recognize rules other than those relating to the determination of rent. The suggestion made in rule 1c that where no rent was reserved, a superior proprietor could apply to resume the rent-free under-proprietary holding was not, therefore, justified by the provisions of section 234 or 79 of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act; and in so far as it excluded rent-free under-proprietors from the operation of section 79, was devoid of any legal authority.

Chapter VIIA of the Oudh Rent Act was added by the United Provinces Act IV of 1901 in substitution for sections 52—55 of the Oudh Land Revenue Act, 1876, which was repealed by the United Provinces Act III of 1901. Under sections 52—55 of the old Oudh Land Revenue Act, 1876, suits for the resumption of land used to be filed in the Civil Court, and there was no provision in it, corresponding to section 107H of the existing Oudh Rent Act, authorising the Revenue Courts in resumption proceeding to treat land, held rent free from the 13th February 1856 or for 50 years and by two successors to the original grantee, as land held in under-proproprietary right. Section 30, clause (d), of the old North Western Provinces Rent Act (XII of 1881) contained a provision, declaring land so held for fifty years prior to the 22nd day of December 1873, by at least two successors to the original grantee, to be land held in under-proprietary right. When Chapter VII (A) was inserted in the Oudh Rent Act by the United Provinces Act IV of 1901, a somewhat similar provision was introduced in Oudh, conferring an under-proprietary right instead of proprietary rights on such rent-free holders under certain conditions. Section 107H does, however, not profess to exhaust the methods, in which under-proprietary rights can be acquired any more than the rules which the Oudh Sub-Settlement Act embodies do so [Gouri Shunker v. Maharaja of Bulrampore (7), Murad Bakhsh v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (8) and Raja Bhagwan Bakhsh Singh v. Mazhar Husain (9)]. Section 107H only provides an extra method in which under-proprietary rights can be adjudged or conferred, and the last proviso to section 107B of the Oudh Rent Act indicated that pre existing under-proprietary rights, governed by section 79 of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act, are not affected by it.

The decision in Rup Narain v. Badri Prasad (10) is also relied on in support of the contention that the Civil Courts have no power to re open an issue, determined in the resumption proceeding, and grant a declaration of under proprietary rights with respect to land, which the Revenue Court has allowed to be resumed. But all that was held in that case was that a person could ask the Revenue Court to grant him a declaration of under-proprietary rights under section 107H, and whether the Revenue Court granted it or refused it, according as the conditions laid down in that section were satisfied or not, the propriety of that order could not be challenged in the Civil Court. If under-proprietary rights have existed from before either under a settlement decree or under a grant from a superior proprietor or otherwise, it is immaterial to enquire from what date or by how many successors to the original grantee, they were held rent free. Such a question only arises where there is no previous grant or settlement decree, or where the rights have not otherwise been enquired prior to the date of the resumption proceeding. Where they have not been so acquired, it is open to the Revenue Court to determine under section 107H, whether in certain contingencies the person claiming them ought to be treated to be an under-proprietor in future or not.

In the present case there is no satisfactory evidence to show that the plaintiffs or their predecessors-in-interest held the grove in question as under-proprietors at any time prior to the resumption proceeding. The village in which the grove in question is situated belonged at one time to a family of Qanungos, one of whom was Lachhmi Narain, who was the owner of a one-third share therein. He mortgaged his share to Raja Gauri Shankar, the ancestor of the defendant, some time in 1829, and the mortgagee and his successors-in-interest were in possession of his share from that time. The first summary settlement was made with the Qanungos, but after the confiscation of Oudh, the second summary settlement was made with the defendant's predecessor-in-title, and a sanad was granted to him conferring on him absolute proprietary rights in the village. The under-proprietors were at that time asked to put forward their claims in the Settlement Court within a certain time (Exhibit A 7) and in pursuance thereof some of the members of the family of Qanungos, including Jeorakhan Lal, a kinsman of Sheo Charan Lal, through whom the plaintiffs claim to derive their title, applied for a declaration of their under-proprietary rights in regard to certain plots of land and got a decree. But the grove in dispute was not included by them in their claim. Sheo Charan Lal filed no suit. The grove in dispute was accordingly recorded at the first Regular Settlement in the name of Sheo Charan Lal as a tenant (Exhibit 8 and A 2).

Subsequently a dispute arose between Sheo Charan Lal and the predecessors-in-title of the present defendant about another grove No. 977, old khassra, in respect of which Sheo Charan Lal was similarly recorded as a tenant. Sheo Charan Lal had got the grove cut and wanted to bring the land under cultivation, but he was ejected by the superior proprietor. He then filed a suit against him to recover possession of the land and got a decree from the Court of Mr. Dyson, the Deputy Commissioner of Unao, on the 17th March 1874. Relying on rule 1 of Circular No. 63 of 1863, Mr. Dyson held that Sheo Charan Lal had under-proprietary rights in the said land (Exhibit 11).

The Courts below, acting on the analogy of that judgment, held that the plaintiffs, who are the successors-in-interest of Sheo Charan Lal, similarly possessed under-proprietary rights in land No. 904, old khasra. But Sheo Charan Lal was the son of Musammatt Rahsa, who was the daughter of Mansa, a member of the family of Qanungos; and there is nothing to show that the grove was originally planted by Mansa, or a member of the family of Qanungos at a time when they were the proprietors of the village. Jeorakhan Lal did not include it in his claim, and all that can be said with certainty is that Sheo Charan Lal held it at the time of the first Regular Settlement in his possession. The instructions contained in rule 1 of Circular No. 63 of 1863 applied to groves, planted by persons who at the time of planting them were proprietors of the village, and had remained in possession of them, though the village, in which they stood, had passed from their hands. The instructions directed that such groves should be dealt with as under-proprietary tenures or vestiges of the proprietary right held by the former proprietors; but those conditions have in each case to be proved and cannot be inferred from uncertain data. In Umrao Singh v. Ali Raza Khan (11) and Girdhari Lal v. Jaswant Singh (12), it was, moreover, held by this Court that the above Circular was meant only for departmental guidance and had not the force of law. The position of Sheo Charan Lal does not, therefore, appear to have been different from that of any other grove-holder, and the plaintiffs have no under-proprietary rights in the land in dispute.

(11) 1 O. C. 231 at p. 251.

(12) 15 Ind. Cas. 181; 15 O. C. 33.

Their alleged adverse title was negatived by the Court of First Instance, whose decree on that point has become final. No subsequent grant is alleged, and there being no proof of any pre-existing under-proprietary rights, the question whether as rent-free holders, they had satisfied the conditions laid down in section 107H of the Oudh Rent Act to entitle them to be treated as under-proprietors was one exclusively cognizable by the Revenue Court. The Revenue Court had power to determine whether the conditions laid down in section 107H had been established and to confer or withhold under-proprietary rights accordingly and the propriety of that order in the case of persons, who had no under-proprietary rights from before, cannot be challenged in the Civil Court. The decision in Oudh Behari v. Raja Prithipal Singh (13) does not apply, because the circumstances of that case were entirely different and approximated to the conditions laid down in rule 10 of the Oudh Sub-Settlement Act (XXVI of 1886).

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the plaintiffs' claim dismissed, but in the circumstances, no order is made as to the costs in any of the Courts.

Appeal allowed.

JUDGMENT.

ABDUR RAHIM, J. — The third defendant, who died since the institution of the suit at the age of about 92, was the grandfather of the plaintiffs, 1st and 2nd respondents, and divided brother of 1st defendant's father. He purported to make a settlement of the family property on 16th May 1911 by Exhibit A, and the question under litigation was how far, if at all, it was valid and binding. Both the Courts have found that the settlement was not brought about by the exercise of fraud or undue influence on the part of the 1st defendant, and I am unable to say that the finding is vitiated in law as contended for the 1st and 2nd respondents by the onus of proof being wrongly laid on them. The finding was arrived at on a consideration of all the circumstances and the evidence bearing on the point, and we are not at liberty to re-open it in second appeal. The Subordinate Judge, however, held that the settlement was validly revoked by the 3rd defendant by Exhibit B, inasmuch as according to him the 3rd defendant had executed Exhibit A under a mistaken notion that the plaintiffs were not of sound mind.

Exhibit B had been executed, not as the Subordinate Judge wrongly imagined after the institution of the suit, but before it, and it was under this mistake as to its date that he raised an additional issue and called for a finding upon the effect of the deed of revocation. It is undoubtedly strange that the plaintiffs should not have relied upon the alleged revocation in the plaint itself and it is also remarkable that the 3rd defendant should not have joined as a plaintiff in getting the deed of settlement set aside, if the allegations of the plaintiffs were well founded. However, that may be, even granting that the plaintiffs were not in fact of unsound mind as stated in Exhibit A, that in itself would not be sufficient in law to invalidate the settlement. Apart from any question as to whether the 3rd defendant, at the time he executed the deed, understood the nature of his act,—which plea so far as it was raised at the trial has been negatived—the mistaken assumption only bears upon the motive which induced the 3rd defendant to execute Exhibit A, and does not amount to a mistake as to his rights which would justify the Court in passing a decree for its cancellation.

It is clear from the provisions of Exhibit A by which the 3rd defendant sought to make a complete partition of the family properties, allotting to himself and the plaintiffs the shares to which they were respectively entitled, that he intended to create a division of status and property. That being so, there can be little doubt that the settlement which he sought to make of his own share was valid in law. It is undoubtedly settled law that a co-parcener cannot make a gift of his undivided share [see Baba v. Timma (1) and Ramanna v. Venkata (2)]. But once the co-parcenary is converted into tenancy in common, there is no bar to a member of the family disposing of his share by gift, and it can make no difference in law that both the partition and gift were effected by means of one and the same instrument.

But the settlement under Exhibit A is of specific properties (in Schedule A), which the 3rd defendant reserved to himself for his share. That a Hindu father can partition the family property between himself and his sons is well established in this Presidency. [See Kandasami v. Doraisami Ayyar (3) and Murugayya v. Palaniyandi (4).] It is hardly disputed that the fact that there are grandsons can be no bar to the exercise of his rights; for the grandsons' right is to stand in the shoes of their father. The question then arises, should the death of the son make any difference? There is no express decision on this point, but it is difficult to see why it should. The right of a father to partition family property between himself and his sons and their sons would seem to include the right to make such partition when the sons are dead and grandsons alone are living. A partition at the will of the father or grandfather can only be valid if it is equal and fair. In this case, there can be no doubt that it was so, as was conceded before the District Munsif and is amply clear from the facts.

The Subordinate Judge's judgment must be set aside and the decree of the District Munsif restored with costs here and in the Court below.

OLDFIELD, J.—I entirely agree, and only wish to add a few words regarding the scheme of the settlement, Exhibit A, and Mr. T. Rangachariar's argument from its terms. It no doubt begins with a statement that the plaintiffs have lost their right to the settlor's properties because they are of unsound mind. But, looking to the fact that it was apparently drafted without legal advice and to the clear statements contained in its later provisions, I find no difficulty in holding that the settlor's intention was to make a partition, the reference to plaintiffs' incapacity having no effect, except that their shares were vested during its continuance in 1st defendant for their benefit. As they were never really incapable, that and the further provisions for 1st defendant's reversionary interest never took and never could have taken effect. Exhibit A being essentially an expression of intention to adopt a divided status, my learned brother's conclusion follows, that the gift of the settlor's share to 1st defendant is valid, notwithstanding that it is contained in the same document.

I, therefore, concur in the decree proposed.

Appeal allowed.

Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), ss. 21, 13 (6)—Adjudication order, ex parte—Adjustment, subsequent, with creditors—Annulment of adjudication—“Payment in full”, meaning of—Creditor, duty of.

A man who has been adjudicated an insolvent ex parte has a right to have the matter argued in Court.

A creditor has no right to get an insolvent adjudicated insolvent and then to receive from him a sum in adjustment of his claim. He is not entitled to use his petition as a lever to secure preferential treatment for himself. [p. 208, col. 2.]

It is not permissible for an insolvent, once an act of insolvency has been committed, to say that the act was discounted because he had gone round to his admitted creditors and forced upon them a compromise or adjustment. That is not a payment in full within the meaning of section 21 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. Such payment must be in cash in full of the claims and the insolvent cannot escape the result of the adjudicating order and prevent the Court from inquiring fully into his affairs by adjusting his claims and getting the creditors to accept less than what they considered due to them, nor by thus getting a receipt in full can he then contend that his debts have been paid in full, and the adjudication order should be annulled. That can only be done by a composition or scheme of arrangement under the Act. [p. 209, cols. 1 & 2.]

It is only when the petitioning creditor's debt is disputed that the Court can stay proceedings under section 13 (6) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. [p. 209, col. 2; p. 210, col. 1.]

In re SHIVLAL RATHI.

JUDGMENT.—On the 22nd of January 1917, an order was made for the adjudication of Shivalal Rathi on the joint petition of the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, Ltd., the Japan Cotton Trading Co., Ltd., the firm of Gosho Goshi Kaisha, the firm of T. Nishimatsu & Co., and the Yokohama Kitto Kaisha, Ltd. The total amount due to the petitioning creditors was about 2½ lakhs. The act of insolvency alleged was that Shivalal Rathi had given notice to the petitioners that he had suspended or was about to suspend payment of his debts, and the affidavit in support of the petition alleged that the insolvent approached the petitioners with a proposal that they should accept a composition and settle with him. He left with them statements showing his assets and liabilities, according to which he was in hopelessly insolvent circumstances. His total liabilities exceeded Rs. 10,00,000, while his assets were valued by him at a net sum of Rs. 1,00,000 or thereabouts. On the 20th January 1917, there was a meeting at the office of the second petitioners at which the said Shivalal Rathi and the representatives of the petitioners were present. At this meeting Shivalal Rathi said that he had suspended payment and that he could not pay the differences in respect of either the January or March or April vaida contracts. Shivalal Rathi also laid before the said representatives a statement of his position, and though at first he said that his assets were not worth more than Rs. 1,08,000, he subsequently after further discussion disclosed certain other assets which showed that his assets were worth about Rs. 1,50,000. He then expressed his willingness to pay a composition of four annas in the rupee. The petitioners were not satisfied that he had made an honest statement of his affairs and asked that he should pay a composition of eight annas in the rupee. He expressed his inability to pay so much and ultimately the meeting broke up. On the 30th of January 1917, the insolvent applied for a Rule to annul the adjudication order. He said that besides dealing in forward contracts he dealt in several businesses which were very lucrative. Besides these businesses he was in the habit of making forward contracts in which sometimes he suffered very heavy losses and in that year owing to the fluctuatuations in the cotton market he did suffer heavy losses and, therefore, he did see the petitioning creditors as stated in their affidavit and told them that he had suffered heavy losses and he was unable to pay the said losses in full if his creditors in the cotton contracts insisted on full payment. He went on to say that most of the people with whom he made such cotton forward contracts were Marwari dealers in the market, who were simply wagering, and, therefore, he really meant to say that he was unable to pay his debts in full, if he chose to pay both the debts which were legal and those which were wagering or illegal. The petitioning creditors seemed not to have fully understood him and they immediately rushed into Court and had him adjudged. That he never suspended his business nor did he ever suspend payment, that he had now adjusted with the petitioning creditors his accounts and he had paid them Rs. 1,02,044-11-6 in full adjustment of their accounts, and he annexed a copy of the letter written by the solicitors of the petitioning creditors to his solicitors showing the payment and consenting to the adjudication order being annulled. The letter is dated the 27th January 1917 from Messrs. Payne and Company to Messrs. Tyabji Dayabhai and Company. It says:—

“With reference to the interview we had with your Mr. Chandulal we beg to note that our clients the petitioning creditors have agreed to adjust their claims in full for the sum of Rs. 1,02,044-11-6 and on account thereof you have paid to our clients to day the sum of Rs. 1,00,000. We will have no objection to the adjudication being annulled on payment of the balance of the adjusted amount on Monday next and our costs of and incidental to the adjudication.”

I granted the Rule, because a man who has been adjudicated ex parte has a right to have the matter argued in Court and I also granted the Rule because the conduct of the petitioning creditors appeared to be most improper. They had no right to get him adjudicated on the 22nd January 1917 and then receive apparently from the insolvent himself a large sum in adjustment of their claims on the 27th January. A creditor is not entitled to use his petition as a lever to secure preferential treatment for himself.

In re SHIVLAL RATHI.

As a matter of fact on the first affidavit of the insolvent there is no ground whatever for annulling the adjudication order. However, he has put in another affidavit of the 5th of February 1917. He distinguishes in that affidavit his legitimate dealings and what he calls purely wagering transactions. In paragraph 4 he says:—

"It is true that I have paid these wagering Marwaris on account of some of the transactions entered into by me but as admitted in paragraph 5 of the said affidavit (i. e., affidavit of Jethabhi Virji of the 3rd of February 1917), I always said that I would have to suspend payment if my creditors in respect of wagering transactions did not accept a composition of four annas in the rupee. But I never said that I had actually suspended payment. In fact my liability to this sutta debt did not arise until the 25th day of January last and many of the transactions were even for March and April vaidas, and, therefore, I could not have suspended payment before the 25th day of January 1917 while the adjudication order was made on the 22nd January 1917."

Apparently what the insolvent wants to do is to divide his debts into two classes, viz., debts due to persons who might not succeed if they filed suits against him, and debts which he admits. He says he is entitled to disregard the first class of debts entirely and make a compromise with the other class. I cannot assent to that contention. It is not for a person who has incurred debts to lay down to this Court that some of his debts are not recoverable. That would entirely depend upon the decision of the Court before whom the claims came for adjudication. At present all I know is that the insolvent made forward contracts with various persons, and until those contracts have been held to be wagering contracts, they are good contracts and consequently debts due on them are good debts and can be proved in the insolvency. But leaving that aside, the conduct of the insolvent since the 22nd January 1916 shows that the allegations made by the petitioning creditors in their affidavit on the petition were correct, and that he was not able to pay the admitted debts, nor is it permissible for him, once the acts of insolvency had been committed, to say that the acts were discounted because he had gone round to his admitted creditors and forced upon them a compromise or adjustment. That is not a payment in full within the meaning of section 21. Payment must be in cash in full of the claims and the insolvent cannot escape the result of the adjudicating order and prevent the Court from inquiring fully into his affairs, by adjusting his claims and getting the creditors to accept less than what they considered due to them; nor by thus getting a receipt in full can he then contend that his debts have been paid in full, and the adjudication order should be annulled. That can only be done by a composition or scheme of arrangement under the Act. From the insolvent's affidavit it is clear that very large sums have been paid since the 22nd January 1917 to some of his creditors. He says they have been paid by his friends. Those friends, as far as I can see, will find themselves in somewhat embarrassing circumstances. They would have as security the promises of the insolvent, which I have no doubt were given when the payments were made, that his assets would be charged with the repayment of those moneys. But as long as this order of adjudication stands, his assets are vested in the Official Assignee from the date of his acts of insolvency, and persons, who made those payments on his account, will not be able to go against those assets.

It has been contended that a considerable time will elapse before the questions with regard to the disputed claims can be decided and that will involve hardship upon the respondent. In the ordinary course it does not follow that the Official Assignee will disallow those claims which the insolvent now disputes. I have no doubt that the creditors will stoutly deny that they had been wagering with the insolvent and in any case whether the Official Assignee allows or disallows the claims then there will be an appeal to the Insolvency Court by either party against his decisions. Those questions will be very speedily decided. But that is not a ground on which an application to annul an order of adjudication can be supported when it is proved that acts of insolvency have been committed. It is only when the petitioning creditor's debt is disputed that the Court may stay proceedings under section 13 (6). The insolvent, as I have said, cannot divide his debts into two classes and say that one class is negligible, and then go to the other class and say: "I am prepared to pay you a certain amount." It is suggested that those creditors have been paid in full by means of an adjustment and that is not a composition. That is an argument which is puerile. Those creditors have no doubt grasped the situation and are perfectly prepared to take six annas in the rupee on their claims, as a very satisfactory solution of their difficulties. Clearly on the insolvent's own statement of his assets, they would not be able to get so much in the insolvency. The fact remains that it is a composition and not a payment in full. Therefore, in my opinion, acts of insolvency have been committed and that is practically admitted by the affidavit of the insolvent, and in that case I cannot apply the provisions of section 21. I cannot say that the debtor ought not to have been adjudicated insolvent, and it has not been proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the debts have been paid in full.

Therefore, the Rule must be discharged.

The costs of those creditors who opposed the Rule to be added to their claims.

The Official Assignee's costs to come out of the assets.

Rule discharged.

RESPONDENT.

Muhammadan Law—Inheritance—Co-heirs, nature of estate of—Alienation by one co-heir in possession of estate, whether binding on others.

If one of the co-heirs of a deceased Muhammadan, in possession of the whole estate of the deceased or of any part of it, sells property in his possession forming part of the estate for discharging the debts of the deceased, such sale is not binding on the other co-heirs or creditors of the deceased. [p. 215, col. 2.]

Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi, 26 M. 734; and Hasan Ali v. Mehdi Husain, 1 A. 533; 1 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 423, disapproved.

Case-law and authorities on the subject reviewed and discussed.

Per Abdur Rahim, J.—The theory of Muhammadan jurisprudence, on which the right of succession and inheritance is based, is that even after death, the deceased's rights in his properties still inhere in him, to the extent necessary for meeting the funeral charges and the legal obligations and liabilities incurred in his lifetime and also for carrying out his wishes, as expressed in his last Will and testament, within the limits laid down by the law. [p. 212, col. 2.]

On the death of a Muhammadan, the inheritance vests in his heirs according to their respective shares, although in the administration of the estate the funeral expenses, debts and legacies must be paid first and it is only the residue that is available for distribution among the heirs. It is not correct to say that the devolution of the estate on the heirs does not take place or is postponed until the funeral expenses and the debts and legacies have been paid. [p. 212, col. 2.]

The co-heirs of a deceased Muhammadan take their shares in severalty, their rights being analogous to those of tenants-in-common, and not of members of a joint Hindu family. [p. 213, col. 1.]

According to the principles of Muhammadan Law one co-heir of a deceased Muhammadan has no right to deal with the shares of the other heirs. [p. 213, col. 2.]

Appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bakewell, dated the 23rd March 1915, in Ordinary Original Civil Suit No. 381 of 1913.

This Original Side Appeal coming on for hearing on the 24th and 27th March 1916, upon reading the grounds of appeal, the judgment and decree of this Court in Civil Suit No. 381 of 1913 and the material papers in the suit, and upon hearing the arguments of Mr. C. Venkatasubbaramiah, for the Appellant, and of Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Aiyar, for the Respondent, and the case having stood over for consideration till 17th April 1916, the Court made the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

JOHN WALLIS, C. J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Bakewell, J., in a suit, brought by the Receiver appointed in a creditor's suit for the administration of the estate of a deceased Muhammadan, for a declaration that a sale-deed executed by the widow of the deceased was void and not binding on the creditors and was in any event inoperative except as to the extent of the widow's one-fourth share and for possession. The learned Judge held that the sale was valid only to the extent of the widow's one-fourth share, but gave the 1st defendant, her alienee, a charge on the whole property for

ABDUL MAJEETH KHAN v. KRISHNAMACHARIAR.

Rs. 3,452 paid by him in satisfaction of a mortgage-decree against the deceased with further interest on the mortgage-money till the date of payment. The learned Judge after discussing the authorities came to the conclusion, as against the creditors of the deceased on whose behalf the suit was brought, that the widow, even though she was in possession of all the properties of the deceased, had no authority to take upon herself the administration of the estate even to the extent of selling the suit properties to raise money to satisfy the mortgage-decree in respect of these very properties which had been passed against the deceased. For the appellant it is contended that this decision is opposed to Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1).

The whole subject is one of considerable difficulty. If a Muhammadan appoints an executor, the executor has no doubt power to sell for the discharge of the debts of the deceased, and in the absence of the executor this could have been done by the Kazi. The High Courts, as is well known, have differed as to whether a sale under a decree obtained by a creditor against one of the co-heirs in possession of property of the deceased is binding on the other co-heirs who were not parties to the suit, and the question has been answered in the affirmative both in Calcutta and Bombay. In Davalava v. Bhimaji Dhondo (2), this was limited to the case where as here one of the co-heirs was in sole de facto possession of the whole estate and this limitation was adopted in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1), where it was further held that a co-heir in possession of the whole estate could equally sell property belonging to the estate in satisfaction of debts without any suit having been instituted and decree passed against such co-heir. At the same time the Court set aside as regards the other co-heirs the sale of item No. 11 to the 13th defendant in consideration of a debt of Rs. 25 and a further payment of Rs. 50, apparently on the ground that it was unnecessary and improper in the circumstances, though this is not expressly stated. This case was cited with approval on another point by Abdur Rahim, J., in Hyderman Kutti v. Syed Ali (3), with reference to the validity of sales by the de facto guardian of a minor. The learned Judge in the course of his judgment referred to the general rule relating to sales by a person professing to deal with another's property but without legal authority so to do, and observed that such sales are generally treated as mauquf or dependent, and upheld if made of necessity or if they are manifestly beneficial, and similar considerations may possibly apply in a case like the present. Bakewell, J., was apparently of opinion that the decision in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1) was inapplicable where, as in the present case, the alienation is being questioned by the other creditors. If the balance of convenience may be regarded, I am not sure that it is for the benefit of creditors any more than of co-heirs to lay down a rigid rule that alienations can be made only by the whole body of co-heirs or in a suit to which they are parties. The question is one of importance and difficulty, and as the authorities are by no means consistent, we have decided to refer the following question to a Full Bench:—

When one of the co-heirs of a deceased Muhammadan in possession of the whole estate of the deceased or of any part of it sells property in his possession forming part of the estate for the discharge of the debts of the deceased, is such sale binding on the other co-heirs or creditors of the deceased, and, if so, to what extent?

PHILLIPS, J.—In this case the plaint property was alienated by a Muhammadan widow, who was in sole possession of the whole property belonging to her late husband, in order to discharge debts due by him. No doubt the sale was voluntary, but it purports to have been made because a creditor was threatening to execute a decree against the property, and the consideration for the sale was not paid until after execution had been taken out against the suit property, the widow and the other heirs being parties to the execution petition. Two of the other heirs admit that they took no interest in the property, because deceased's debts exceeded his assets but the Receiver of the deceased's estate now questions the validity of the alienation. If the sale to the appellant had been effected by Court it would apparently have been upheld both by the Calcutta and Bombay High Courts in accordance with the decisions in Khurshatibi v. Keso Vinayek (4), Davalara v. Bhimaji Dhondo (2), Muttyjan v. Ahmed Ally (5) and Amir Dulhin v. Baij Nath Singh (6). In Allahabad, however, it has been held by the Full Bench that when the property of a Muhammadan intestate is sold in execution of a decree passed against the heirs in possession of the estate, the sale is not binding on an heir who was not a party, but in order to recover possession of his share that heir must pay the purchaser a proportionate amount of the decree-debt [Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (7)]. In this Court in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1) it was held that it was immaterial whether the sale was voluntary or effected by Court in execution of a decree, provided that the seller was in possession of all the effects of the deceased and the Bombay cases were followed, but in applying the law as regards sales in which only part of the consideration money was applied in discharge of a debt due by the deceased the principle laid down in Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (7) was followed, although that case is not referred to in the judgment. In Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (7) Mahmood, J., discusses fully the Muhammadan Law on the subject and criticises the rulings of the Calcutta High Court referred to above. The decisions in Bombay and Calcutta are not based on the same grounds and the view taken in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1) appears to be somewhat different to the view of other Courts. In these circumstances I agree in making the proposed reference to a Full Bench.

This appeal coming on for hearing on the 30th and 31st October 1916 as per above order, upon perusing the Order of Reference and upon hearing the arguments of the Counsel on both sides and the question having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court expressed the following OPINION.

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—The question referred to us is in these words: When one of the co-heirs of a deceased Muhammadan, in possession of the whole estate of the deceased or of any part of it, sells property in his possession forming part of the estate for discharging the debts of the deceased, is such sale binding on the other co-heirs or creditors of the deceased and, if so, to what extent? The answer must be in the negative.

On the death of a Muhammadan, the inheritance vests in his heirs according to their respective shares, although in the administration of the estate the funeral expenses, debts and legacies must be paid first, and it is only the residue that is available for distribution among the heirs. It is not correct to say that the devolution of the estate on the heirs does not take place or is postponed until the funeral expenses and the debts and legacies have been paid. This is evident from the following facts: if an heir designated by the law dies after the death of the propositus, his share descends on his own heirs and does not lapse to the general estate. Each heir is entitled to the income that has accrued since the testator's death in proportion to his share and he can transfer his share by sale or gift subject, it may be, as to the latter form of disposition to such restrictions as are imposed by the doctrine of musha.

The theory of Muhammadan jurisprudence, on which the right of succession and inheritance is based, is that even after death, the deceased's rights in his properties still inhere in him, to the extent necessary for meeting the funeral charges and the legal obligations and liabilities incurred in his lifetime and also for carrying out his wishes, as expressed in his last Will and testament, within the limits laid down by the law. A deceased person is classed among persons of defective capacity and his rights and obligations are considered not merely with reference to matters pertaining to this world but also with respect to his spiritual concerns. The payment of his funeral expenses and debts is described as his last need. And as for testamentary bequests, it is stated that, according to strict juristic theory, they should not be lawful at all but have been sanctioned in order that the testator might make up for his shortcomings in life by making gifts to deserving objects.

It is argued that, as soon as a man is seized with 'death illness' (i. e., illness which results in his death), the right of succession of his relatives comes into existence, although it remains in an inchoate state, that is, in the nature of a spes successionis until death actually takes place, and the heirs entitled to succession are not ascertained until then. It is upon this theory that the right to bequeath by Will is treated as a concession to the deceased and is limited to one-third of his possessions. The result is, on the death of a person his estate is to be divided in this way, one portion for the deceased himself equivalent to so much of the estate as is necessary and sufficient for meeting his funeral expenses, debts, obligations and bequests, the last not exceeding one-third of the estate, and what remains is to be distributed among the heirs according to their respective shares. Funeral expenses, debts and legacies are given preference because they are allowed by virtue of the rights of the deceased.

As far back as 1878, the Judicial Committee in Bazayet Hossein v. Dooli Chund (8) held that an heir-at-law was entitled to alienate his share, in spite of the fact that there were debts of the deceased still outstanding and it would not have been possible to hold this if the inheritance did not devolve on the heir on the death of the propositus. Mr. Justice Mahmood in Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (7) has fully discussed the question and I do not think it would be of any use to add anything more to his reasoning. As regards the nature of the tenure of the co-heirs' shares, the heirs of a deceased Muhammadan take their shares in severalty, their rights being analogous to those of tenants-in-common, and not of members of a joint Hindu family. [See Abdul Khadar v. Chidambaram Chettyar (9)].

There cannot be the slightest doubt, therefore, upon the principle of Muhammadan Law and also upon the authorities that one heir has no right to deal with the shares of the other heirs. In the Muhammadan system such a tenure of property is called shirkat, which literally means "participation" and in law, 'joint rights,' and which is translated as 'partnership' by Mr. Hamilton in his translation of the Hedaya.

The definition of shirkat as given by him is, "shirkat, in its primitive sense, signifies the conjunction of two or more estates, in such a manner that one of them is not distinguishable from the other. The term shirkat, however, is extended to contracts, although there be no actual conjunction of estates, because a contract is the cause of such conjunction. In the language of the law it signifies the union of two or more persons in one concern." (See Grady, Book XIV, page 217.) This definition, however, must be read with what follows and, so reading, it will be clear that shirkat is a generic term of law and applies both to joint ownership and to contracts of partnership. The former is called shirkat ul-milk which is translated by Mr. Hamilton as "partnership by the right of property;" and the latter, which is partnership proper in the sense of the English law, is called shirkat-ul-akd. In shirkat-ul-milk, the ownership acquired is either "optional," or "compulsive," to use the terms of Mr. Hamilton, and in the latter category are included the rights of co heirs. With respect to such rights it is laid down, "In this species of partnership (i. e., the rights of two persons inheriting one property), therefore, it is not lawful for one partner to perform any act with respect to the other's share, without his permission, each being as a stranger with respect to the other's share. It is, however, lawful for either partner (i. e., one of the heirs) to sell his own share to the other partner (i. e., the co-heir) in all the cases here stated:—and he may also sell his share to others, without his partners' consent," excepting in certain cases with which we are not concerned.

ABDUL MAJEETH KHAN v. KRISHNAMACHARIAR.

This is absolutely clear authority in proof of the position that one heir has no authority, in law, to deal with the shares of his co-heirs. In face of it it is not necessary to refer to other original text books. It is stated, however, in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1), that "if the creditor of the deceased can seek his relief against one of several co-heirs in a case where all the effects of the deceased are in the hands of that heir, it can make no difference whether the heir meets the demand by a bona fide voluntary sale, or the property is brought to sale in execution of a decree obtained against him." To the same effect is a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Hasan Ali v. Mehdi Husain (10). The statement in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1) was purely by way of obiter dictum and with all respect to the learned Judges, they failed to bear in mind that the provision of the Muhammadan Law, that a decree against one heir in possession of all the effects of the deceased is binding on all if obtained after contest, is part of the processual law of that system and is not based on the ground that a single heir, if he happens to be in possession of the estate of the deceased, represents the rent of the heirs for the purposes of administration generally. The ground on which a decree against one of the heirs, in such circumstances, is treated as res judicata is, as stated in the books, that the decree in such cases is, in law, against the deceased and not against the particular heir who is made defendant in the suit.

In Hedaya the matter is discussed in the chapter relating to the duties of the Kazi and in some other text books in the chapter dealing with claims, in which chapters the rules of procedure of the Muhammadan system are mostly laid down. In dealing with the question whether where one of the heirs obtains a decree for the recovery of the property of the deceased in possession of a third person more than his share in that property should be made over to him in execution of the decree, it is stated that all the three Doctors, that is, Abu Haneefa and his two disciples, agree that the decree enures not only in favour of the heir who actually is the plaintiff but also of the heir who did not join on account of absence from the country, though there is a difference of opinion as to whether the decree-holder shall be given possession of more than his share. This is how the principle is enunciated in the Hedaya (Grady, page 349), "for anyone of the heirs of a deceased person stands as litigant on the part of all the others with respect to anything due to, or by the deceased, whether it be debt or substance; since the decree of the Kazi, in such case, is in reality either in favour of or against a deceased; and any one of the heirs may stand as his representative with respect to such decree." The qualifying words "with respect to such decree", which I have italicised, are a material part of the proposition and, negative, by implication, the suggestion that, apart from a decree, of Court, a single heir represents the entire estate of the deceased and can deal with the shares of the co-heirs without their consent. In other text books of Muhammadan Law, such as *Bahrurrai*q and Alimajullah, the same proposition is laid down under the heading of 'Claims'. Nowhere have I found any general statement that, apart from representation in suits, one heir is entitled by his acts to bind the shares of the others. The dictum to the contrary, therefore, in Pathummabi v. Vittil Ummachabi (1) and the decision in Hasan Ali v. Mehdi Husain (10) seem to be without sufficient authority and inconsistent with clear statements of the law in books of authority.

There are a number of rulings, especially of the Calcutta High Court, in which the rule of Muhammadan Law as to one heir representing the other co-heirs in suits has been adopted. [See Assamathem Nessa Bibee v. Roy Lutchmееput Singh (11), followed by Muttyjan v. Ahmed Ally (5), Bussunteram Marwary v. Kamaluddin Ahmed (12), and Amir Dulhin v. Baij Nath Singh (6).] In the Allahabad High Court, on the other hand, the decision of the Full Bench in Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (7), where it was held, dissenting from Assamathem Nessa Bibee v. Roy Lutchmееput Singh (11), that this question is not governed by the Muhammadan Law, but by the Civil Procedure Code, has been followed in the later rulings of that Court [see Dallu Mal v. Hari Das (13).] In Bombay [Khurshetbibi v. Keso Vinayek (4)], the view taken by the Calcutta High Court on this point has been adopted by the learned Judges, though proceeding to a considerable extent on the analogy of the Hindu Law.

It is not necessary for us to pronounce any definite opinion upon this class of cases, which deal with the question how far a decree against one of the heirs of a deceased Muhammadan binds the others and under what circumstances.

So far as voluntary alienations are concerned, which alone form the subject-matter of reference, the Muhammadan Law is clear that one of the heirs of a deceased person is not competent to bind the other heirs by his acts.

SPENCER, J.—I agree with the judgment of Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim just now pronounced.

SRINIVASA AIYANGAR, J.—I agree. In the absence of any right in one of the heirs to represent the co-heirs, one of several co-heirs can only deal with his or her interest in the ancestor's property inherited by them. My learned brother has shown that there is nothing in the Muhammadan Law giving such a right to one of the co-heirs who may happen to be in actual possession of the whole of the ancestor's estate; such possession, it must be remembered, is presumably on behalf of all the co-heirs. He is not constituted the representative of the deceased and cannot administer his property even for the limited purpose of paying off his debts. In Khiaraj-mal v. Daim (14), Lord Davey, referring to a sale by one of the heirs of a Muhammadan for discharging the debt due by the ancestor, said, "prima facie his conveyance would pass only his share." See page 37. Representation in a suit may conceivably stand on a different footing, for as stated by their Lordships in the same judgment at page 35. "The Indian Courts have properly exercised a wide discretion in allowing the estate of a deceased debtor to be represented by one member of the family, and in refusing to disturb judicial sales on the mere ground that some members of the family, who were minors, were not made parties to the proceedings, if it appears that there was a debt justly due from the deceased, and no prejudice is shown to the absent minors. But these are usually cases where the person named as defendant is de facto manager of a Hindu family property, or has the assets out of which the decree is to be satisfied under his control;" and they applied this principle in that very case to the estate of Nabi Baksh. However, that is not the question here.

PROBHAT CHANDRA SHOME AND OTHERS
—DEFENDANTS —APPELLANTS

versus

SHASHADHAR KUMAR GHOSE —
PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Appeal, second — Undue influence — Finding of fact — Registration after period of limitation, validity of — Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 23 — Public policy — Agreement to compound criminal case, validity of — Compoundable and non-compoundable offences.

The finding of a lower Appellate Court that one of the parties to a suit for cancellation of a document executed it under undue influence is a finding on the merits and is, therefore, not open to question in second appeal, where there is some evidence, however untrustworthy, to show that pressure was put upon that party and that the other party in whose favour the document was executed obtained an unfair advantage. [p. 219, col. 2.]

The registration of a deed is not invalid and ineffectual merely because the deed was presented for registration by the grantee without the consent of the grantor after the expiry of the period limited for the purpose, and the delay was accounted for by the production of a false certificate of the illness of the grantor. [p. 219, col. 2.]

Quære.—Whether an agreement for the compromise of a criminal case is void as being opposed to public policy, where the case was initiated by a complaint alleging compoundable and non-compoundable offences but the Magistrate issued summons only in respect of the compoundable offence.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Dacca, dated the 19th April

PROBHAT CHANDRA SHOME v. SHASHADHAR KUMAR GHOSE.

1915, confirming that of the Munsif, Munshiganj, dated the 15th June 1914.

FACTS material will appear from the following judgment of the Court of First Appeal:—

“This appeal arises out of a suit to cancel a document. The admitted facts of the case are as follows:—

Many disputes were going on between the parties. On the 4th November 1912 the plaintiff filed a complaint before the Magistrate charging the defendant No. 1 and two of his relations with offences under sections 143, 447, 426 and 352 of the Indian Penal Code, and on the following day, the defendant No. 1 and a Muhammadan filed a similar complaint charging the plaintiff, his son-in-law, and some others with offences under sections 144, 147, 379, 504, 323 and 352 of the Indian Penal Code. Summonses were issued by the Magistrate in both cases under section 426 only. After some adjournments, the parties entered into a compromise recorded in a separate deed and registered it. Both the criminal cases were dismissed for non-appearance and all the accused acquitted.

The plaintiff's case now is that he only partially executed the document under coercion and undue influence caused by the pressure of the criminal prosecution, specially as his son-in-law was implicated as an accused, and as the latter was to have appeared at the B. A. examination that year; that the compromise to stifle a criminal prosecution was invalid and that there was no legal registration of the document.

The defendants Nos. 1 and 3 only appeared and contested the suit in the lower Court. The lower Court has decreed the suit, cancelling the document but awarding no costs to the plaintiff. The defendants have preferred this appeal. The plaintiff has preferred a cross appeal as to costs.

The points for decision in this appeal are:—

1. Whether the deed of compromise which had the effect of dropping the criminal cases was valid in law?
2. Whether the document was validly registered? Has the Civil Court jurisdiction to consider the point?
3. Whether the document was induced by undue influence or coercion? Is it binding on the plaintiff? Was it fully executed?

Whether the parties acted upon the compromise? Whether the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the lower Court?

4. The other points are not of much importance and need not be considered.

FINDING.—(1). It has already been observed that the Magistrate issued summons under section 426 only of the Indian Penal Code, which is a compoundable offence. It is argued by the appellants' Pleader that the deed compounding the offence under section 426 is perfectly legal. On the respondent's side it is argued that the competency of the parties to compound a criminal case should be judged not only from the particular section of the Indian Penal Code under which the Magistrate issues summons in the first instance, but from the offences alleged in the petition initiating the case, because it is quite open to the Magistrate to alter the charge at any time and try the accused under the non-compoundable offences mentioned in the original petition.

The appellants' Pleader has cited the following cases in support of his contention, namely, Amir Khan v. Amir Jan (1), Mahomed Ismail v. Faizuddi (2), Rai Charan Purkait v. Amrita Lal Gain (3). The respondent's Pleader contends that the last case rather goes in his favour, for the criminal case ought to have been treated by the Magistrate as a warrant case and the accused should have been called upon to answer the graver charges of a non-compoundable character. The respondent's Pleader also contends that the principles laid down in the case of Fanindra Nath Chatterji v. Emperor (4) apply here and that the petition of complaint and the complainant's statement on oath (vide Exhibit 1) should determine the character of the case, as to whether the stifling of such a prosecution would be opposed to public policy. The cases reported as Kailash Chunder Pal v. Joynuddi (5) and Bishu Shaik v. Sober Mollah (6) are also quoted in support of the above view.

PROBHAT CHANDRA SHOME v. SHASHALEKH KUMAR GHOSE.

I have fully considered the arguments of both sides and I think that the question whether an agreement to stifle a criminal case is opposed to public policy or not, does not depend on the procedure the Magistrate chooses to adopt for reasons of his own. That question depends on the original intention of the complainant as disclosed in his petition and first examination on oath. That should form the determining factor as to whether an agreement dropping such a prosecution would be opposed to public policy or not.

I accordingly hold that the deed is unlawful, and I find this point against the appellants.

(2). As to the registration of the document, it is evident that there were grave irregularities. It is clear that the plaintiff did not appear before the Sub-Registrar within 4 months of the execution as required by section 34 of the Indian Registration Act. The plaintiff did not show cause for the delay in his appearance and in fact he had no business to do so, because he was not willing to register the deed. The opposite party showed cause by producing a medical certificate of the plaintiff's illness. The Sub-Registrar forwarded the same to the Registrar, who accepted it and condoned the delay. I do not think that the proviso to section 34 contemplates any such thing. That section evidently applies to the case of an executant who is desirous of having a document registered and who has been delayed and shows sufficient cause for the same. That section and proviso does not apply where one party wants to force the opposite party to register a document. The procedure in such a case is laid down in section 35 of the Indian Registration Act.

The appellants' Pleader contends that the Civil Court has no authority to question the discretion exercised by the District Registrar. He relies upon the cases of Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (7) and Gokulbhoj Mulchand v. Tullockchand Harnath (8) in support of his contention. But the facts of those cases are different. In the present case, the order of the District Registrar was obtained by fraud on the strength of a false medical certificate. The certificate is vague and it refers to the illness in Chaitra or Baisack. The plaintiff was not at all ill after that and he could have easily attended the Sub-Registrar's office within due date if he had liked. The illness referred to in the petition Exhibit 1F clearly refers to the plaintiff's indisposition on that date only and not on any previous date. The principle laid down in the cases of Joginee Mohun Chatterjee v. Bhoot Nath Ghosal (9), Baij Nath Tewari v. Sheo Sahoy Bhagut (10) and Broja Gopal Mukherjee v. Abinash Chandra Biswas (11), cited by the respondent's Pleader, I think, applies to the facts of the present suit.

I do not think that the irregularity in the present case, which was substantially due to the false medical certificate, is cured by section 87 of the Indian Registration Act. There is another grave defect in the procedure of the Sub-Registrar. The document in dispute contains a map. The map is undoubtedly a part of the document. Under section 21 (4) of the Indian Registration Act, the document could not have been registered unless it was accompanied by a true copy of the map. Under section 62, Chapter XIII of the Registration Rules, the copy of the map requires to be signed by all the executants. If the map attached to the deed Exhibit F be supposed to be the original, it appears that it is not signed by all the parties. The plaintiff has not signed it at all. The map being a part of the document itself, there was thus no complete execution by the plaintiff. If the map be supposed to be the copy required by section 21 (4) of the Indian Registration Act, it transgresses the provisions of section 62 of the Registration Rules. In any case, the document should not have been admitted to registration.

I called for and inspected the register of the Registration Office and examined the map attached to the book. It bears the signatures of all the executants, although the plaintiff denies his own signature. It is, therefore, likely that the Sub Registrar by mistake retained the original and returned the copy to the parties. But as I have observed before, the document should not have been registered unless the copy was signed by all the applicants. I think that according to the principle laid down in the case of Jambu Parshad v. Muhammad Nawab Aftab Ali Khan (12), the registration is invalid in the present case. I think that the Civil Court has jurisdiction to make such a declaration. I accordingly find this point against the appellants.

(3). The appellants' Pleader contends that there being no issue on this question, the point cannot be considered. But the lower Court has considered the matter, and the point is covered by the first issue fixed by the Munsif. No doubt, the issue as framed is wide, but it is not vague. The case of coercion and undue influence is set up in the plaint and denied in the written statement. The appellants have, therefore, not been prejudiced by the lower Court not fixing a separate issue on the point.

The case of coercion is not made out. There is no evidence that the complaint lodged by the defendant No. 1 was false and was thus an act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code. As to the case of undue influence, the defendant No. 1 appears to have been in a position to dominate the will of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's son-in-law was implicated as an accused. The said son-in-law was to have appeared in the B. A. examination in that year. He came on a casual visit to his father-in-law's house and his being implicated in the criminal case was no doubt a cause for sore distress to the plaintiff. If the son-in-law had not been implicated, the plaintiff would never have agreed to the compromise. Then again the defendant No. 1 filed a petition and insisted on the personal attendance of the son-in-law. The defendant No. 1 would not be satisfied by the appearance of the son-in-law through a Mukhtear, although the Magistrate proceeded in the first instance under section 426 of the Indian Penal Code. All this must have weighed greatly on the plaintiff's mind.

And then, the defendants did not accept the draft compromise prepared on the plaintiff's side. They insisted on their own draft in its entirety. They gave no quarter. The plaintiff's friends had no option but to urge the plaintiff to accept the defendants' draft. Although the plaintiff has not produced his draft, it is clear that there must have been considerable difference in the two drafts, otherwise the defendants would not have insisted with such tenacity upon the acceptance of their own draft.

It is, however, incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the defendants obtained an unfair advantage over the plaintiff by the transaction. There is no doubt no detailed evidence on this point, but there is some evidence on the plaintiff's side. The map attached to the deed would go to show that the plaintiff has been put into a disadvantageous position. The plaintiff has been obliged to give up most of the valuable lands which were in his possession before, without an adequate or a fair compensation. The map would also show that roughly the plaintiff has been obliged to give up a large area. The oral evidence under the circumstances on the plaintiff's side as to the unfairness of the transaction is sufficient to shift the onus on the defendants, who have not adduced any evidence to discharge it. Besides it is apparent that the plaintiff took the earliest opportunity of repudiating the transaction. Had it been a fair one, the plaintiff would not have behaved himself in that way. I, therefore, think that the transaction is not binding on the plaintiff. As to the allegation that the compromise was acted upon, I have to observe that the defendants did not remove the eastern huts till after the registration was effected. The service of summons in this suit was effected on the eastern plinth. The defendants' witnesses have deposed contrary to the written statement. The plaintiff is S annas owner of Madan Sing's bari and the fact of his cutting trees in that bari cannot be held to be an acceptance of the terms of the deed. I, therefore think that there has been no acceptance on the part of the plaintiff of the terms of the deed and thus it is quite open to him to bring this suit.

PROBHAT CHANDRA SHOME v. SHASHADHAR KUMAR GHOSE.

I have already observed that the plaintiff did not sign the map which is a part of the document itself. The defendants have adduced no evidence to show that the plaintiff actually signed the original map retained in the registration office. The deed including the map was written in duplicate. The defence evidence shows that all the parties signed both the documents and both the maps at the same time and place, but the said evidence is false. The map in plaintiff's possession was filed in the Court below, and has also been filed here. There is no signature of any party in the said map. The allegation in the plaint that the deed was only partially executed thus seems to be true. Such a deed cannot, therefore, stand even if it is legally valid and duly registered. I find this point in favour of the respondent.

(4) I think that the order of the lower Court as to costs is right.

It is accordingly ordered that this appeal be dismissed with costs and interest at 6 per cent. per annum from this date till realization. The cross-appeal is also dismissed."

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—This is an appeal from the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, Dacca, dated 19th April 1915, confirming the decree of the Munsif of Munshiganj.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff, Shashadhar Kumar Ghose, for the cancellation of an agreement dated the 22nd Magh 1319 (4th February 1913). It appears that the plaintiff and the defendants are co-owners of certain properties. Something occurred early in November 1912, which led the parties to file complaints against each other in the Criminal Court. The agreement in question, which is an agreement for the partition of the common properties, is expressed to have been made for the purpose of putting an end to all disputes between the parties and for the purpose of settling or compromising the criminal cases which had been instituted and were still pending at the time.

The Courts below have concurred in setting aside the agreement on three grounds. They have held, firstly, that the agreement is opposed to public policy as being an agreement to stifle criminal prosecutions and, therefore, void under section 23 of the Contract Act; secondly, that the Registering Officer had no jurisdiction to register the agreement, and thirdly, that the agreement was obtained by the exercise of undue influence.

There is room for considerable doubt as to the correctness of those conclusions. On the question of the agreement being opposed to public policy, the decision of this Court in Muhammad Ismail v. Samad Ali Bhuyan (13), and its bearing on the view of the law taken in the Courts below would at least require consideration. On the question of registration again, I am quite unable to follow the reasoning of the those Courts and am satisfied in my own mind that they were wrong in supposing that the agreement was not validly and effectually registered. It is unnecessary, however, to examine these questions in detail because on the remaining question, the question of undue influence, while I doubt very much whether I should have reached the same result on the merits, the merits are not open in second appeal and the jurisdiction of this Court to interfere is limited. The learned Subordinate Judge, at any rate, seems to have found that the implication of the plaintiff's son-in-law in the criminal proceedings caused the plaintiff much distress of mind and placed the defendant No. 1 in a position to dominate the plaintiff's will, and further that the defendants obtained an unfair advantage over the plaintiff. I have considered whether there is a sufficient finding that the defendants or any of them actually brought pressure to bear on the plaintiff. It appears that the plaintiff's son-in-law was due to appear in the B. A. examination of the Calcutta University and that the defendant No. 1 filed a petition in the criminal case which he had instituted and in which the son-in-law was an accused, objecting to the latter appearing through a Pleader and insisting upon his personal appearance. The Subordinate Judge lays stress upon that and upon the defendants refusing to consider any modification at all of the agreement which they offered to the plaintiff. According to the Subordinate Judge they issued a sort of ultimatum. If the offer was not accepted in its entirety the criminal case would be proceeded with. I do not know whether I should have taken the same view of the evidence. The case is one somewhat near the line. It bears a strong resemblance to the case of Gobardhan Das v. Jai Kishen Das (14). That case was decided by the Allahabad High Court under the old section 16 of the Contract Act, but according to the commentators is still good law under the section as it now stands (Pollock and Mulla's Contract Act, 2nd edition, page 79). It came before the Court as a first appeal and the merits were open. Here, as I have said, the merits are not open and I cannot say either that there is no finding that the plaintiff was subjected to pressure or that there is no evidence at all on which that finding or the finding that an unfair advantage was obtained can be supported. That being so, the present appeal fails, but, in my opinion, the suit does not redound to the plaintiff's credit. He and his son-in-law were acquitted in the criminal proceedings and though the plaintiff may have got the worst of the bargain, I have a strong impression that if the plaintiff had been a man of sensitive honesty the suit would not have been brought. I propose, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed without costs.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

The rule that where a Statute creates a right and provides at the same time a remedy, that remedy and no other is available, has no application to a case where a right is not created by the Statute but exists independently of it. [p. 223, col. 2.]

The words "may appeal" in section 45 (1) of the Provincial Insolvency Act mean that a party aggrieved with an order may, if he thinks fit, prefer an appeal against it to the High Court but is not bound to do so. [p. 221, cols. 1 & 2.]

The words "shall be final" used in section 46 (1) of the Provincial Insolvency Act do not signify that the decision of the Insolvency Court cannot be impeached in a regular suit, but they simply emphasise that no second appeal lies against an appellate order of the District Judge. A person whose property is claimed by another person has, under the common law, the right of instituting a suit against the latter to establish his title, and this remedy has not been extinguished by the Provincial Insolvency Act. So that where the Official Receiver takes into his possession property as belonging to the insolvent, which a third party claims as his own, the latter can bring a suit against the Official Receiver in a Civil Court to establish his right. Miscellaneous second appeal from the order of the Additional Judge, Amritsar, dated the 9th December 1915.

Mr. Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Muhammad Din, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case lie within the narrowest possible compass. One Azim Bakhsh was adjudged an insolvent and the Official Receiver took possession of his property including the houses in dispute. The plaintiffs thereupon claimed certain rights in the houses, but the Insolvency Court disallowed their claim. Being dissatisfied with this order, they brought a regular action to establish their interest in the property. The Trial Judge dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiffs had a right of appeal under section 46 of the Provincial Insolvency Act against the order of the Insolvency Court, and that the remedy by suit was barred. Upon appeal the Additional Judge came to the contrary conclusion, and remanded the case for decision on the merits.

DUNI CHAND v. MUHAMMAD HUSSAIN.

The question for determination in this appeal as well as in the connected Civil Appeal No. 101 of 1916 (in which the Insolvency Court released the property, and the creditor of the insolvent brought the regular suit), is whether the remedy by way of appeal provided by the Provincial Insolvency Act is cumulative or substitutional for a regular suit. Section 46 of the said Act, which is invoked by both the parties in support of their respective contentions, is in the following terms:—

"46 (1). Any person aggrieved by an order made in the exercise of insolvency jurisdiction by a Court subordinate to a District Court may appeal to the District Court, and the order of the District Court upon such appeal shall be final.

Provided that the High Court, for the purpose of satisfying itself that an order made in any appeal decided by the District Court was according to law, may call for the case and pass such order with respect thereto as it thinks fit.

(2). Any person aggrieved by an order made by the District Court under sections 15, 16, 24, 26, 35, 37, 42, 43, sub-section (2), or 44 otherwise than in appeal from an order made by a subordinate Court may appeal to the High Court.

(3). Any person aggrieved by any other order made by a District Court otherwise than in appeal from an order made by a subordinate Court may appeal to the High Court by leave of the District Court or of the High Court.

(4). The periods of limitation for appeals to the District Court and to the High Court under this section shall be thirty days and ninety days respectively."

The District Judge, Khwaja Tusadduk Hussain, who decided the case which has led to Civil Appeal No 101 of 1916, considered that the use of the words "may appeal" in the section showed "that a party aggrieved with the order may impeach it by appeal or otherwise if he has any other remedy provided by law. Had the Legislature intended to confine the remedy to appeal only the word 'shall' would have been appropriately used as in old section 540, Civil Procedure Code." This argument is, in our opinion, wholly fallacious, and cannot be accepted. The obvious meaning of the aforesaid expression is that a party aggrieved by a decision may, if he thinks fit, prefer an appeal to the High Court, but is not bound to do so. He has a right of appeal, which he may or may not exercise and it would be intolerable if the Legislature in conferring the right of appeal made it obligatory upon a person to avail himself of it, even when he regarded the decision as correct or, for some other reason, did not wish to take his case to the higher Court. The mere fact that he is not compelled to exercise the right of appeal to which he is entitled under the law does not lead to the conclusion that the remedy by a regular suit is open to him.

Mr. Tek Chand, for the appellant on the other hand, places his reliance upon the words "shall be final" used in the 1st paragraph of the section, which words, he contends, afford an indication of the intention of the Legislature that the decision of the Insolvency Court cannot be impeached in a regular suit. It is to be observed that the word "final" is confined in its operation to orders passed by the District Court upon appeal and does not find a place in the sub-sections dealing with the orders passed by the High Court. There can be no manner of doubt that the intention of the Legislature in using the term "final" was to make it clear that no second appeal lay against an appellate order of the District Judge. There being no Court in India empowered to hear an appeal from an order passed by the High Court on appeal, there was no necessity of providing expressly that such an order should be final; and indeed any such provision would have been wholly redundant. The contention urged on behalf of the appellant, if accepted, would lead to a reductio ad absurdum inasmuch as an action to contest the order of the District Judge would be barred, but the same rule would not, so far as section 46 is concerned, apply to the order passed by the High Court. We are clear that the provisions of section 46 do not support the argument of the learned Pleader for the appellant.

It is incontestable that a person, whose property is claimed by another person, has under the common law the right of instituting a suit against the latter to establish his title; and we do not think that the right of bringing a similar action against the Official Receiver, who is simply the representative of the insolvent, has been taken away by the Legislature. Now, section 9, Civil Procedure Code, lays down in the clearest possible terms that the Courts shall have jurisdiction to try all suits of a Civil nature excepting suits of which their cognisance is either expressly or impliedly barred. The Provincial Insolvency Act contains no express provision precluding the Court from taking cognisance of a suit of this nature; and as regards the implied intention, the main argument addressed to us is that the aforesaid Act is, as the preamble shews, a consolidating Act, and that it was contemplated that all questions arising thereunder should be determined by the Insolvency Court and should not be made the subject of a regular suit.

The question whether the provisions of an Act contain a necessary implication depriving a person of the right of action must depend upon the language of the particular enactment, and it is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule which would govern all cases. Now, in respect of the Guardians and Wards Act, a Full Bench of this Court in Ghasita v. Wazira (1), upon a consideration of the different sections of the Act, has ruled that a regular suit for the custody of a minor is not permissible after the commencement of the above Act; and the same view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court in Sham Lal v. Bindo (2). The Bombay High Court has, however, adopted a different rule, vide Sharifa v. Munekhan (3). Can we say that there are provisions in the Provincial Insolvency Act which necessarily lead to the inference that the right of a person to institute a suit to protect his property has been taken away, and that he is bound to have recourse to the Insolvency Court? The fact that the Act consolidates the law relating to matters properly falling within the cognisance of the Insolvency Court does not necessarily conflict with the right of a person to bring an action to establish his title to the property which, according to him, has been wrongly claimed or seized by the Official Receiver. On the other hand we find that section 39, sub-section (5) of the Act, contains a provision to the effect that no suit for a dividend shall lie against the Receiver; and it seems to us that if the Legislature had intended to preclude the ordinary Court from adjudicating upon a dispute between the Official Receiver and an outsider relating to property, it could have easily manifested its intention by inserting a similar provision.

The learned Pleaders on both sides express their inability to cite any case under the Provincial Insolvency Act dealing with the point before us. But the principle enunciated in Naginal Chunilal v. Official Assignee (4), a case decided under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909, is, in our opinion applicable here. The learned Judges of the Division Bench, after considering, inter alia, the relevant sections of that Act, arrived at the conclusion that the common law remedy by suit had not been extinguished by the Act, and that where the Official Assignee takes into his possession property as belonging to the insolvent, which a third party claims as his own, the latter can bring a suit against the Official Assignee in a Civil Court to establish his right. And the same rule has been laid down in a Single Bench of the same Court in Rassul Haji Cassum, In re (5). The learned Judge, in adjudicating upon the motion by certain claimants to the property seized by the Official Assignee as belonging to the insolvent, made the following pertinent observations:—

“For in all essential respects the case laid before me by this motion is in effect the same as the case of a party who seeks to have an attachment raised. In those circumstances the Court deals with the objection summarily, and if as a result it is prima facie satisfied that the attached property was not at the time of the attachment in the possession of, and did not belong to, the judgment-debtor, it removes the attachment and leaves the creditor to establish his right, if any, by a regular suit. So here if the Court were summarily satisfied that the property now in dispute was, when seized, in the possession of, and did belong to, the claimants, it appears to me that it ought to order the Official Assignee to restore that property to them, and, if so advised, to pursue it by means of a regular suit. I think there can be no doubt that motions of this kind have not infrequently been brought in the Insolvency Court, although there is no recorded case to which my attention has been drawn, and in which all the arguments for and against this procedure have been considered and adjudicated upon."

Further, we find that in a case under the Indian Insolvents Act, which Act has now been replaced by the Presidency Town Insolvency Act, a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court (Sir Barnes Peacock and Mr. Justice Markby) held that an order passed by the Insolvency Court did not prevent the owner of the property which was the subject of the order from suing the Assignee to establish his right to it; vide, Barlow v. Cochrane (6). Upon appeal to the Privy Council against the decree of the High Court allowing the plaintiff's claim, the point was again raised by the defendants' Counsel, as appears from the following extracts from the arguments given at page 222 of 14 Moore's Indian Appeals [Miller v. Barlow (7)]:—"The order of the Insolvent Court, pronounced on the 16th May 1867, not having been appealed against, bound the appellant as to the matter decided therein, and he had no right to sue...but having submitted to the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court, he should have preferred his claim there." The judgment of their Lordships does not contain any expression of opinion upon the matter, but the fact that the decree of the High Court in favour of the plaintiff was upheld clearly, shows that the objection must have been overruled, otherwise the Privy Council would have accepted the appeal and dismissed the suit.

Neither the judgment of the Privy Council nor that of the Calcutta High Court, nor again the one pronounced by the Bombay High Court and reported in Indian Cases was cited at the Bar; but this fact is clearly no justification for ignoring the rulings which have an important bearing upon the point before us. It is accordingly clear that the law obtaining in the Presidency Towns does not prohibit an action to establish title to the property claimed as belonging to the insolvent; and there is no cogent reason for holding that the Provincial Insolvency Act has made a departure from this rule. In the face of these judgments we consider it unnecessary to discuss the argument derived by way of analogy from the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act or the Punjab Municipal Act, or from the decisions based upon those Acts. We fully accept the principle enunciated in Rama Chandra v. Secretary of State (8) and cited with approval in Municipal Committee, Ambala v. Mohender Singh (9), that where a Statute creates a right and provides at the same time a remedy, that remedy and no other is available. But that rule has absolutely no application to a case where, as in the suit before us, the right was not created by the Act, but existed independently of it. Section 41 of the Indian Evidence Act cited by the appellant's Pleader enumerates the various judgments, which are to be treated as judgments in rem, and provides that they are conclusive not only against the parties, but against the whole world. The section has obviously no bearing upon the matter in issue.

For the foregoing reasons we hold that the plaintiff's remedy to establish his title in a regular suit has not been either expressly or impliedly taken away by any Statute. We accordingly affirm the decision of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

LETTERS PATENT APPEAL NO. 115 OF 1916.

RANGASAMI UDAYAN—
DEFENDANT NO. 4—APPELLANT

MANICKAM PILLAI—PLAINTIFF—
RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VIII, rr. 1 to 10, O. IX, rr. 6 (1) (a), (7), 13—Omission of defendant to file written statement—Declaration of ex parte, validity of.

A defendant in a suit appeared in person on 4th September 1915; he was then ordered to file a written statement and given time till 21st September 1915; on the latter date, he appeared and asked for further time. The request was refused, and he was declared ex parte:

Held, per Ayling, J. (Seshagiri Aiyar, J., dissenting), that the order declaring the defendant ex parte was not ultra vires. [p. 225, col. 2.]

Per Ayling, J.—The rules in Order VIII of the Civil Procedure Code, intervening between rules 1 and 9, are all directed to making clear what should be contained in a written statement referred to in rule 1. They are really of the nature of explanations to rule 1. Rule 10 of Order VIII relates back to rule 1 as well as to rule 9. [p. 225, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J., (dissenting).—A party should not be declared ex parte when he appears in person, though his defence may be struck out. [p. 225, col. 2.]

Chunni Lal v. Chamman Lal, 7 A. 159; A. W. N. (1884) 313; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 352.

The omission to make a provision in rule 13 of Order IX, regarding the non-filing of a written statement, is a clear indication that a declaration of ex parte can be made only for the non-appearance of a party. [p. 226, col. 2.]

The words "from whom a written statement is required" in rule 9 of Order VIII, cannot be read as referring back to rule 1. A whole mass of matter intervenes between the two rules and it would be doing violence to the language to read those words as referring to rule 1. Rule 10 cannot be connected with rule 1 of Order VIII. [p. 227, col. 1.]

Appeal, under clause 15 of the Letters Patent, against the judgment of Mr. Justice Coutts-Trotter, in Civil Revision Petition No. 1881 of 1915, preferred against the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Tirukoilur, in Original Suit No. 480 of 1915.

Mr. C. Padmanabha Iyengar, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. Chandrasekara Iyer, Amicus Curiae.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—Appellant before us was the 4th defendant in Original Suit No. 480 of 1915 on the file of the District Munsif of Tirukoilur. He received notice of suit and appeared in person on the 4th September 1915. He was then ordered under Order VIII, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, to file a written statement and at his own request was allowed time till 21st September 1915 to do so. He again appeared on the latter date, and apparently asked for further time but as the reasons he gave were insufficient in the opinion of the District Munsif, this request was refused. As he did not file the written statement on the 21st September 1915, as required, an order was passed on that date declaring him ex parte.

On the 12th October 1915, he applied under Order IX, rule 7, to have the ex parte order set aside: but this application was dismissed.

He then presented a revision petition to this Court against the order dated 21st September 1915, which was dismissed by Coutts Trotter, J., on the 10th March 1916. Against the latter order, he prefers the present Letters Patent Appeal.

Respondent was not represented; but at our request Mr. Chandrasekara Iyer was good enough to argue the case for him as amicus curiae.

The sole question for disposal is whether the Munsif's order, dated 21st September 1915, declaring appellant ex parte for failure to file a written statement as required is ultra vires.

The only provision of law specifically empowering a Court to proceed ex parte is Order IX, rule 6 (1) (a), and this is contingent on the defendant failing to appear. It does not apply to a case in which a defendant appears but fails to file a written statement. Appellant's Vakil contends that there is nothing in the Code penalising disobedience to an order under Order VIII, rule 1; and that the Court can only proceed under Order X, and examine the defendant orally, recording his admissions and denials. Mr. Chandrasekara Iyer, on the other hand, relies on Order VIII, rule 10, as impliedly conferring the power to declare a defendant ex parte.

Assuming the last mentioned rule to apply, I think it would authorise an ex parte declaration. It runs thus: "Where any party from whom a written statement is so required fails to present the same within the time fixed by the Court, the Court may pronounce judgment against him or make such order in relation to the suit as it thinks fit."

To summarily pronounce judgment against a party without considering evidence (which the Court is specifically empowered to do under the first part of the rule) is the most drastic measure conceivable; and the power in the alternative to pass any other order it thinks fit must include the power to make any less severe order. It would be a less severe order to defer passing judgment until the evidence of the other side had been recorded and considered. This is what an ex parte declaration amounts to; and it by no means necessarily involves judgment against the person declared ex parte.

The difficulty is in deciding whether rule 10 only applies to a failure to comply with a requirement under rule 9; or whether it also covers failure to present a written statement required under rule 1. The word "so" is certainly ambiguous. Appellant relies on the close juxta position of the two rules and argues that the words "so required" in rule 10 can only relate to a requisition under rule 9; otherwise instead of "so required" the words used would be "required under this Order."

On the other hand if this were the intention of the Legislature, there is no object in making a separate rule. The penal clause would more suitably and conveniently form part of rule 9 (cf. Order X, rule 4). It would moreover be strange for the Legislature to penalise so heavily the failure to present an additional written statement, when required, and to leave unpunishable the failure to present a written statement when required at the outset of the case: cf., also the case to provide penal clauses in Order X, rule 4, Order XI, rule 21, and Order XVI, rule 20. I do not think that the provisions of Order X afford an adequate explanation. This order merely ensures that the material averments of parties shall, somehow or other, be placed on record at the outset of the trial. The Court may take them down from the mouths of the parties but it also may, as empowered by Order VIII, rule 1, require the defendant to put his case in writing. And where the Legislature empowers a Court to require a party to do a certain thing, it is most unlikely that it deliberately intended to leave that Court without power to enforce obedience by penalty for disobedience. In fact, the omission of a penalty for disobedience to the requisition under this rule could, in my opinion, only be explained on the ground of oversight, an explanation which, unless compelled to, we should be slow to adopt.

And I do not think on a careful consideration of Order VIII that any such conclusion is justified. The rules in the Order intervening between rules 1 and 9 are all directed to making clear what should be contained in the written statement referred to in the former. They are really of the nature of explanations to rule 1 and might not inappropriately appear as part of it. If they did and if rules 9 and 10 stood numbered as rules 2 and 3, it would, I think, be hard to contend that rule 3 applied only to rule 2 and not to rule 1.

It is curious that a point of this nature should not long ago have been covered by authority; but the only case quoted to us is that reported as Sivarajadhani Nilakantham Pillay v. Kuppagantulu Ramiah Pantulu (1), in which it was held that failure to file a written statement did not justify the trial of a case ex parte. The Code in force at the date of this decision (Act VIII of 1859), however, contained no provision analogous to Order VIII, rule 10; nor did it empower the Court to require the presentation of a written statement. In my opinion, rule 10 of Order VIII relates back to rule 1 as well as to rule 9; and that the District Munsif's order was not ultra vires.

In my opinion, there is no ground for interference and the Letters Patent Appeal should be dismissed.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I regret very much I am not able to agree with my learned colleague. The facts have been fully stated in his judgment: but for the fact that an important principle relating to processual law is involved, I would not have considered it necessary to differ from Mr. Justice Ayling's judgment.

In my opinion, the District Munsif acted illegally in the exercise of his jurisdiction in declaring the appellant ex parte. I accept the Munsif's statement that he asked the appellant to file a written statement on the 4th September 1915 when he appeared in person. I do not think the failure to file the written statement entitled the District Munsif to declare the appellant ex parte. It is admitted that he was present on the adjourned date. It sounds incongruous that a defendant who appears in person should be declared ex parte [see

(1) 2 M. H. C. R. 311.

RANGASAMI UDAYAN v. MANICKAM PILLAI.

Chunni Lal v. Chamman Lal (2)], I can understand the Court declaring that his defence should be struck out, and that he is disentitled from filing any written statement in future. From my limited experience of the work on the original side, I know that cases in which defendants fail to file their written statements in time are placed in the Undefended Board. I speak with some hesitation, but I do not think that a defendant who appears but does not file his written statement would be declared ex parte on the original side. The difference between declaring a defendant ex parte and placing the case in the Undefended Board seems to be this. A defendant declared ex parte has no right of audience until the order is set aside, whereas a person whose written statement has not been received would have an opportunity of cross-examining the plaintiff and his witnesses and of showing that the plaintiff has not proved his case, although he may be debarred from proving his defence. To take a concrete instance, the defence to a money claim may be, that it is barred by the rule of res judicata. A defendant whose written statement is not accepted would not be allowed to produce evidence to prove this defence: but he could, by cross-examination of the plaintiff and his witnesses, show that the plaintiff is not entitled to the amount he claims. Take another instance; to a suit in ejectment based on title the defence of adverse possession may be the answer. For failure to file his written statement in time, the defendant may be precluded from adducing evidence to prove this: but, if he appears, he would be permitted to show that the plaintiff has no title. Thus the difference between declaring a defendant ex parte and refusing to accept his written statement thereby striking out his defence is a substantial one. In my opinion, the defendant to whom time has been given to file his written statement and who fails to tender it in time, but who still appears in person should not be subjected to the disqualification of being declared ex parte.

An examination of the Orders and rules of the Code of Civil Procedure seems to bear out this view. Order IX, rule 6 (a), makes it a condition precedent to the declaration of ex parte that "the plaintiff appears and the defendant does not appear." Rule 11 of the same Order contemplates that when some of the defendants appear and others do not, "the Court at the time of pronouncing judgment shall make such an order as it thinks fit with respect to the defendants who do not appear." Apparently under this rule, so long as all the defendants are not ex parte, the defendant who was absent at an earlier stage can take part in the hearing at a subsequent stage. Rule 13 appears to me to be fairly conclusive of the question. This rule enjoins on the Court to set aside the ex parte order if the defendant satisfies the Court "that he was prevented by any sufficient cause from appearing." The appearance certainly includes personal appearance. The import of the rule is that the defendant could be declared ex parte for his non-appearance, and not for failure to file a written statement. If failure to file a written statement is a good cause for declaring a defendant ex parte, the rule should have provided for reasons being shown for failure to file the written statement in time. The absence of such a provision is very significant. My conclusion is that a declaration of ex parte can only be made for non-appearance of the party.

I shall go back a little and examine Order VIII. Rule 1 of that Order is a considerable improvement upon section 110 of the Code of 1882. Under that section, the written statement could have been tendered at any time; and there was no provision enabling the Court to call for one. Rule 1 supplies that deficiency; but no penalty is imposed for not filing the written statement called for. Rule 9 relates to statements after the filing of the first written statement. Very often the Court may ask the plaintiff to file a statement in answer to some specific allegations made in the defendant's written statement; or it may be that at the suggestion of the plaintiff or after discovery and inspection, the Court considers that the defendant should file a further statement. Rule 9 enables the Court to get from the parties statements of the above description. Rule 10 prescribes the penalty for failure to comply with such a request. Even if I am prepared to read this rule as enabling the Court to declare a defendant ex parte, I am unable to hold that the words "from whom a written statement is so required" as referring back to rule 1. A whole mass of matter intervenes between the two rules, and I consider it would be doing violence to grammar to read the words I have italicised as referring to rule 1. It may be a case of omission or not, I am unable to connect rule 10 with rule 1. Order X, rule 4, and Order XVI, rule 20, provide for the contumacious conduct of a defendant who appears. The declaration of ex parte is not among the penalties.

Therefore, apart from any decisions, I am of opinion that the order declaring the appellant ex parte was passed without jurisdiction.

Sivarajadhani Nilakantham Pillay v. Kuppagantulu Ramiah Pantulu (1) directly and Shahzada Pakaktar v. Jakriram Bhokath (3) and Raghapa v. Parapa (4) by implication support this view.

I may also say that the exercise of the discretion by the District Munsif seems to have been very arbitrary, although that would not furnish a ground for interference under section 115. There was only one adjournment given and on this date, time was granted to other defendants to file their written statements. Therefore there was no object to be gained by debarring the appellant alone for defending the suit. Reference may be made to the observations of the learned Judges in Ross and Co. v. Scriven (5), which contains very salutary cautions about declaring a defendant ex parte.

Before closing the judgment, I must express my indebtedness to Mr. Chandrasekara Iyer for having ably argued the case on behalf of the counter-petitioner who was not represented before us.

I would, therefore, reverse the order of the District Munsif declaring the appellant ex parte and I remand the case to him for disposal according to law.

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXII, r. 4
—Guardian ad litem, appointment of—Adverse interest —Consent of guardian—Minor, decree against—Suit to set aside decree—Prejudice to minor—Proof.

The mere omission to obtain the consent of the person whom it is proposed to appoint guardian ad litem of a minor is not fatal to the proceeding. It must be shown that the minor was prejudiced by the defect. [p. 228, col. 2.]

A minor when he comes of age can attack a decree obtained against him during his minority upon the ground that the person who represented him in the litigation had an adverse interest, but he must show that in that particular case that particular person had in fact a particular adverse interest. He cannot be allowed to succeed on mere surmise. [p. 228, col. 2.]

Where S., a minor, was sued on a mortgage-bond executed on his behalf by his mother for legal necessity and benefit of the minor, and the mother, who was also the certificated guardian of the person and property of the minor, was appointed his guardian ad litem, but she failed to appear in the suit though notice was served upon her, and a decree was passed against the minor:

Held, that the decree could not be set aside merely on the ground that the mother's consent to act as guardian ad litem was not obtained, when it was proved that the minor was in no way prejudiced by the procedure adopted. [p. 228, col. 2.]

Appeal against a decision of the District Judge, Durbhanga, dated the 24th May 1916, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Durbhanga.

FACTS.—The mother of the appellant, during his minority, executed on his behalf a mortgage-bond in favour of the respondents, in order to pay off the debts due from his father for recovery of which a suit was going to be instituted and to defray certain necessary expenses of the minor. The mortgagee sued the minor on the mortgage-bond and nominated his mother, who had also been appointed guardian of his person and property by the District Judge, as guardian ad litem. The usual notices were served on the minor and the proposed guardian, but no appearance was made. The Court duly recorded an order appointing the mother as guardian ad litem and passed an ex parte decree against the minor. The mother later on tried to have the ex parte decree set aside under Order IX, rule 13, Civil Procedure Code, and also to have the sale held in execution of the mortgage decree quashed on the grounds of material irregularity and substantial loss, but without success. The minor on attaining majority sued to have the decree set aside on the ground of fraud, and also on the ground that he was not properly represented in the suit inasmuch as express consent of his mother was not taken, and that the mother having executed the bond her interest was adverse and she was not a proper person to be appointed as guardian.

Messrs. Saroshi Charan Mitter and Murari Prasad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Baidyanath Narayan Sinha and Harnarayan Prasad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit to set aside a decree on the ground of fraud. The decree had been obtained against the plaintiff during his minority. For the purposes of the suit which resulted in the decree the plaintiff's mother had been appointed as guardian, his mother being at the time appointed as guardian of his person and property by the District Judge. The suit has been dismissed in both Courts.

It has been found that the bond was executed by the mother on behalf of the plaintiff for necessity, that the plaintiff has benefited by the money, and that his mother executed the bond with full knowledge of its contents. We are asked to interfere in second appeal upon the ground that before the order appointing the mother as guardian her consent was not obtained. What happened was that notice was served upon the mother in accordance with the Code of Civil Procedure and she raised no objection to appear for the minor as his guardian. Having regard to the fact that she had executed the bond with full knowledge and for legal necessity it is not surprising that she did not appear in the actual suit, but she did appear in the execution proceeding and she did appear on behalf of the minor in an application for revising the suit. I am of opinion that the mere omission to obtain the consent of the person whom it is proposed to appoint as the guardian is not a defect which is necessarily fatal to the proceeding. The Privy Council have more than once pointed out that a defect in complying with the rule laid down upon the subject of appointing guardians is not necessarily fatal to the proceeding. It must be shown that the minor was prejudiced by the defect. No doubt the Court will be jealous on behalf of the minor in such a case and the Court will be inclined to find that the minor is prejudiced. In the present case there appears to have been overwhelming evidence that there was no sort of prejudice whatever.

It is then contended that the mother had an adverse interest to the minor in the suit. The suggestion is that if some other unknown person had been appointed guardian, the minor might have instructed that unknown person that he should impugn the bona fides of his mother and suggest that his mother had entered into a fraudulent conspiracy against him. That does not appear to me to be a sound suggestion. No doubt when the minor comes of age he can attack the decree obtained against him upon the ground that the person who represented him in the litigation had an adverse interest, but he must show that in that particular case that particular person had in fact a particular adverse interest. He cannot be allowed to succeed upon mere surmise. In the present case the mother was the certificated guardian of the person and property of the minor, and there was in addition ample reason for holding that in fact she had no adverse interest. The result is that I would dismiss the appeal.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—I agree.

Limitation—Construction of document—Bond authorising suit on default of payment of yearly interest or of principal after fixed period—Suit for principal sum—Cause of action.

Where an unregistered bond executed on the 1st of July 1906 provided that the borrower was to pay interest yearly and the principal sum was to be paid within a period of six years and the general clause relating to what was to happen in case of default was, "dar surat wada khilafi mahajan mazkur ko ikhtiar hasil hai ki jaidad mankula wa ghair mankula se wasul kar len:"

Held, that on the proper construction of these words, the plaintiff had a cause of action for a suit for the principal sum, if he brought it within three years from the date of the period fixed for payment, but that the suit for interest which had not been paid for more than three years was barred. JUDGMENT.—The principal question which arises for discussion in this second appeal is one of limitation. The suit was on a bond executed on the 1st July 1906, the executant being the father of the defendant-appellant. The bond was executed in favour of the plaintiff-respondent's father. The sum borrowed was Rs. 1,000, and the following provisions of the bond are material to the consideration of the question of limitation. It was provided in the first place that the borrower was to pay interest yearly at the rate of 8 annas per cent. per mensem. Another undertaking given by the borrower was that the principal sum was to be repaid within a period of six years. Then follows the general clause relating as to what was to happen in case of default. The words used are as follows: "Dar surat wada khilafi mahajan mazkur ko ikhtiar hasil hai ki jaidad mankula wa ghair mankula se wasul kar len." According to the interpretation which was put upon this clause by the Courts below, the words which indicate what is to follow in case of default relate only to the latter covenant, namely, the covenant to pay the principal sum within six years from the date of the execution of the bond; and so both the Courts have held that the claim was within time and have decreed it in full, that is to say, for principal and interest. According to the argument which has been addressed to me on behalf of the defendant-appellant, the suit was beyond time altogether inasmuch as it is said that on a breach of either of the conditions mentioned in the bond the creditor was at liberty to bring a suit for the full money. It is proved, and indeed there can be no doubt, that there has been no payment of interest subsequent to the year 1911 and consequently it must be taken that there has been a breach of the first covenant in the bond, namely, the covenant to pay interest year by year. If we adopt the argument put forward by the learned Counsel for the appellant the whole suit, of course, is time-barred. A number of authorities has been cited to me. These, however, relate for the most part to cases to which either Article 75 or Article 132 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act applies. I am dealing in the present case with a suit on a bond and I have to try and construe the bond so as to ascertain the meaning of the parties. It is an unfortunate fact, but it has to be faced, that the language of the document is far from clear; in other words, it is difficult to arrive at the interpretation as to what is meant by the words "wasul kar len:" do those words mean that the creditor was to be in a position to sue for the whole money? Or do they merely mean that he was to be entitled in case of default of payment of interest to sue for payment of interest only and in case of breach of the contract to pay the principal sum within six years to sue for the principal only? The question is one of some nicety, but having carefully considered the language of the bond it seems to me that it would be unreasonable in the present case to exclude the claim for the principal sum. We have a bond in which there are two covenants; the breach of either of those covenants would constitute what is described in the latter portion of the bond as a "wada khilafi." It seems to me that it may very well be argued that if, as in the present instance, the borrower has failed to pay up the principal sum within a period of six years from the date on which the bond was executed, there has been a breach (wada khilafi) of the second covenant which gives the creditor a cause of action; and as the suit has been brought within three years from the date on which the principal sum was realizable the suit would to that extent be within time. Of course on this construction the claim for interest must be excluded, inasmuch as the breach of the contract to pay interest has taken place at a period much more remote than three years before the date of the suit. It would, I think, be unjust in the present case to dismiss the case in its entirety and as the words are open to the construction which I put on them, namely, that the plaintiff has a cause of action for a suit for the principal sum if he brings it within three years from the date of the period fixed for payment, I think he is entitled in the present case to a decree for the principal sum with proportionate costs. The only other point argued in the case was that the passing of consideration has not been established but I think this plea is untenable. Execution of the deed having been proved, it was for the defendant to show that no consideration had passed.

I allow the appeal in part and give the plaintiff-respondent a decree for Rs. 1,000 with proportionate costs in all three Courts.

Appeal partly allowed.

JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. The respondent executed a security bond in favour of the appellant by which some properties were made security for a certain sum. A money decree was obtained by the appellant on the bond which, though it declared a lien on the properties mentioned in the bond, did not amount to a decree on the footing of a mortgage:

Held, that the decree-holders could not bring the charged properties to sale in execution of the decree and that their only course was to institute a suit on the lien declared by the decree. [p. 232, col. 1.]

An objection of positive law apparent on the face of the proceedings should be given effect to, even if it has not been pressed by the party in whose favour it would work. [p. 231, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge, First Court, Dacca, dated the 21st February 1914.

Mr. N. Sirkar and Babus Provash Chandra Mitter and Susil Madhab Mullick, for the Appellants.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Bysack and Babu Chundra Sekhar Sen, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of proceedings taken in execution of a decree dated the 25th April 1907. The appellants are the decree-holders and the respondent is the judgment-debtor.

It appears that on the 27th April 1899, the respondent mortgaged thirty-seven properties to Krishna Chandra Pal, the predecessor-in-interest of the appellants, as security for a sum of Rs. 22,000. On the same date the respondent executed in favour of the same person another instrument described as a security bond by which the same thirty-seven properties were made security for a sum of Rs. 25,000.

Decrees were obtained on both instruments. The decree now under execution is the decree on the security bond. The decree on the mortgage is dated the 26th June 1908.

The decree on the security bond has been printed. It is a decree against the respondent personally for the sum of Rs. 55,000 with interest and costs. A declaration is added that the appellants are entitled to a lien over the thirty-seven properties but a decree on the footing of a mortgage is expressly refused. The words are: "Plaintiffs' lien to the properties mentioned in the security bond is declared, but the plaintiffs cannot get a decree for the sale of the said pro-

GOBIND CHANDRA PAL v. KAILASH CHANDRA PAL.

Perties...as properties mortgaged and...plaintiffs' prayer to the above effect is rejected." The decree, therefore, while it declares the existence of a lien, is a money decree and can only be executed as such. No suit has been brought on the lien. The decree was put in execution in 1908, with the result that a sum of Rs. 11 was realized. Further attempts were made to execute it in 1910 and 1912 but without success.

In execution of the mortgage decree the appellants purchased some of the mortgaged properties, viz., Nos. 16 and 17 in 1909 for Rs. 1,000, No. 15 in 1910 for Rs. 24,000 and Nos. 1—6 in 1912 for Rs. 24,300.

A fresh application for execution of the decree on the security bond was made on the 11th December 1912. The respondent, by a petition dated the 23rd June 1913, contended inter alia that he was entitled to rateable contribution in respect of the debt due under that decree from the nine properties purchased by the appellant in execution of the mortgage decree and that execution could only proceed for the balance. The appeal is from the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge in the Court below, dated the 21st February 1914, giving effect to that contention in the following terms:—"the nine properties purchased by the mortgagees should rateably contribute to the debt under the decree obtained on the security bond." By further orders dated the 28th February and 7th March 1914, he directed that all the thirty-seven properties should be valued by a Commissioner and that the Commissioner should ascertain their present market value, their value at the date of the security bond and their value at the time some of the properties were sold. We may remark incidentally that it was quite unnecessary to direct so many valuations. The practice of the Courts here is to take the valuation at the date of the instrument creating the security. However, proceedings were stayed by an order of this Court after the appeal was filed.

At the first hearing the only question argued was whether the respondent was entitled to claim rateable contribution in the execution department or whether such a claim should not be made the subject of a separate suit. When we came, however, to examine the papers, it appeared to us that there was a more substantial question involved. The mode in which execution is now sought is by the sale of the thirty-seven properties over which a lien was declared by the decree itself and it seemed to us that the course suggested was within the prohibition enacted in rule 14 read with rule 15 of Order XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code. We accordingly had the appeal argued on this point, with the result that we are confirmed in the view that the present proceedings are inherently defective and must prove infructuous.

No doubt the objection, though it seems to have been mentioned in paragraph 14 of the petition of objections above referred to was not pressed in the Court below and was not urged on the respondent's behalf in this Court until we drew attention to it. Nevertheless the objection is one of positive law apparent on the face of the proceedings, and it cannot be ignored.

The present case is on all fours with the case of Ohundra Nath Dey v. Burroda Shoondury Ghose (1), which was decided under section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act. Section 99 has, of course, been repealed and rule 14 of Order XXXIV which has taken its place is not couched in precisely the same terms. The difference is that while section 99 spoke of "any claim, whether arising under the mortgage or not," rule 14 is limited to claims arising under the mortgage. But the decree now in question is clearly "a decree for the payment of money in satisfaction of a claim arising under" the lien which the decree declares or creates. For the present purpose, therefore, the two provisions are identical and indistinguishable. The decree-holders cannot sell the properties charged except under a decree under which the chargee has had the opportunity to redeem the charge within a fixed period. The case we have cited is similar to the cases of Aubhoyessury Dabee v. Gouri Sunkur Panday (2) and Matangini Dassee v. Chooney-money Dassee (3) reported in the same volume and so far as we are aware, the correctness of these decisions has never been questioned.

RAM PARSHAD v. QADRO.

We may regret that the decree holders are confronted by this obstacle but it is clear they can obtain no benefit from the present proceedings. That being so, the controversy which led to the appeal loses all substance and we need express no opinion in regard to it. The decree-holders cannot bring the charged properties to sale in execution of the decree of the 25th April 1907. Their only course is to institute a suit on the lien declared by that decree.

The judgment of the 21st February and the order of 28th February and 7th March 1914 are set aside.

The case will be remitted to the Court below with the direction that the present application for execution be dismissed.

Orders set aside.

Held, that there being alternative contracts provided for in the mortgage bond, it was open to the mortgagee to forego the one and sue to enforce the other. [p. 232, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Rae Bareilly, dated the 22nd March 1916, reversing that of the Munsif, Rae Bareilly, dated the 30th November 1915.

Mr. Ali Mohammad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mumtaz Husain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-appellant sued in this case for the recovery of money due on a registered mortgage bond, executed in his favour by Musammāt Qadro and her son, Tummi Khan, on the 18th July 1901. Tummi Khan died and was succeeded by his mother, Musammāt Qadro, who is alive and a party to the suit. The bond provided for the repayment of the principal money with interest at 2 per cent. per mensem in two years; and clause 2 of it contained a stipulation that if the interest was not paid regularly in every month the mortgagee shall be at liberty (ikhtiar hoga) either to sue for the unpaid interest or for the entire money due on the mortgage. In clause 5 there was a stipulation that on the expiry of the period fixed for repayment (ba surat inqizai wada) the mortgagee shall be at liberty to recover the entire money due to him by the sale of the mortgaged property and the other property of the mortgagors.

It is admitted that nothing was paid by the mortgagors on account of the said mortgage. The suit was filed on the 19th July 1915 and was decreed by the Court of First Instance. The Lower Appellate Court, however, dismissed it on the ground that the claim was barred by limitation.

Article 132 of the Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908) provides a limitation of twelve years for a suit to enforce payment of money charged upon immoveable property from the date when the money sued for becomes due. If the covenant referred to in clause 2 of the mortgage bond in suit is taken into consideration, the money fell due on the 18th August 1901 when the interest for the first month was not paid, and the claim would be barred by time. But if the condition referred to in clause 5 be considered, the limitation started running from the date when the period prescribed for the repayment of the mortgage money expired. There were thus alternative contracts provided for in the mortgage bond and it was open to the mortgagee to forego the one and sue to enforce the other. A covenant empowering

the mortgagee to sue for payment earlier or to wait till the period originally fixed for payment has expired gives him an option which cannot be taken away by Statute, unless there is anything to show that the grant of such an option is illegal or forbidden by law. The option is for the benefit of the mortgagee, and if he waives it the limitation cannot start running against him in spite of that waiver. In Durga v. Tota Ram (1) it was held that where a bond gave the plaintiff an option in express terms to wait till the expiry of the term originally fixed for repayment, whether the interest due on the bond was regularly paid or not, the claim of the plaintiff could not be regarded as barred by limitation, if he chose to stick to the longer term. In Juneswar Dass v. Mahabeer Singh (2), where a person engaged to repay the amount borrowed with interest on a day named and hypothecated certain lands by way of security with a condition that in the event of the said lands being sold in execution of a decree before the date fixed for repayment, the mortgagee shall be at liberty at once to sue for the recovery of the debt; and before the term fixed for repayment expired, the mortgaged lands were sold in execution of a decree obtained by another creditor on a subsequent mortgage, their Lordships of the Privy Council, in repelling the plea of limitation, observed: "Their Lordships must not be supposed, in coming to this decision, to give any countenance to the argument of Mr. Arathoon that this suit would have been barred if the limitation of six years under clause 16 had been applicable to it. They think, upon the construction of this bond, there would be good reason for holding that the cause of action arose within six years before the commencement of the suit." In Bakhtawar Begam v. Husaini Khanam (3), where a mortgage by way of conditional sale was accompanied by an agreement that the sale would be cancelled on payment of the amount of the consideration in nine years, their Lordships of the Privy Council observed that there was nothing in law to prevent the parties from making a provision that the mortgagor might discharge the debt within the specified period and take back the property, but such a provision should usually be to the advantage of the mortgagor. In Narna v. Ammani Amma (4) it was held that a hyphothecatee was not bound to take advantage of a clause in his bond which in case of default in payment of interest, enabled him to demand the principal before its due date and that a suit restricted to a claim to recover the principal and interest at the rate originally agreed brought within twelve years from the date fixed for repayment of the principal, though beyond twelve years from the date of the first default in respect of interest, was not barred by limitation. The decision in Sheo Narain v. Ram Din (5) does not apply, because it was a case of an instalment bond governed by Article 75 of the Indian Limitation Act. It is noticeable that Article 75 provides for waiver which has the effect of preventing limitation from running; but Article 132 cannot be said to exclude such waiver if the contract in express terms provides for it or prescribes an alternative. In Nettakaruppa Goundan v. Kumarasami Goundan (6) effect was given to the privilege of the obligee to exercise the option and not to demand payment before the specified date. In Gaya Din v. Jhuman Lal (7) the learned Judges who decided that case were not unanimous, and the facts and circumstances of that case cannot be used as a guide to the construction of the document now in suit. Clause 2 of the bond provides an alternative and does not in any way restrict or qualify clause 5, if the alternative referred to in clause 2 is not chosen or is waived.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the case remanded to the lower Appellate Court with a direction to re-admit the appeal under its original number and to dispose of it in the manner provided by law. The costs will abide the event.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 10, cl. (2)—Appeal, dismissal of—Re-admission—Judge, power of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 168—Application for re-admission, limitation for.

A Judge has jurisdiction to re-admit an appeal dismissed by an order under clause (2), rule 10, Order XLI, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 235, col. 1.]

But an order re-admitting such an appeal without notice to the other side is not binding on it. [p. 235, col. 1.]

Even if Article 168 of the Limitation Act does not apply to an application for the restoration of an appeal dismissed under rule 10, Order XLI, Civil Procedure Code, such an application ought to be made within a reasonable time and ordinarily would be too late if made after thirty days from the date of dismissal. [p. 235, cols. 1 & 2.]

Rule against the order of the District Judge, Dacca, dated the 2nd November 1916 in Case No. 133 of 1916.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Bimal Chandra Das Gupta, for the Petitioner.—There is no provision in the Code of Civil Procedure for an application of such a nature as the one in the present case. It was to invoke the inherent power of the Court which can entertain such an application in exercise of that inherent power. The first order made by the Court re-admitting the appeal was good and it had no jurisdiction to make the second order on the same day. The Judge was functus officio. As to inherent power of the Court, vide Balwant Singh v. Daulat Singh (1). The Judge is obviously wrong in saying that the application was time-barred. Article 168 of the Limitation Act does not apply. There is no "want of prosecution" as provided for in Article 168, in this case. That Article applies to an order under Order XLI, rule 19. This case is not under that rule. This application was made to restore an appeal which had been dismissed under rule 10, Order XLI. Order XXV deals with the furnishing of security.

(1) 8 A. 315; 13 I. A. 57; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 707; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1176.

Refers also to Ramhari Sahu v. Madan Mohan Mitter (2). Though Fatimunnissa v. Deoki Pershad (3) has overruled Ramhari Sahu v. Madan Mohan Mitter (2) it was on quite a different ground. The Judge exercised his discretion in the petitioner's favour but vacated his order subsequently without any application on the other side.

Babu Sures Chandra Taluqdar, for the Opposite Party.—The Court had no option but to reject the application under Order XLI, rule 10, sub-clause (2). The period of limitation is one month. Article 168 of the Limitation Act applies. Ramhari Sahu v. Madan Mohan Mitter (2) does not apply, it speaks of non-compliance with High Court rules. Failure to pay costs amounts to non-prosecution of the appeal. The opposite party had no notice whatsoever, so he is not bound by the order of the Judge of the 2nd November 1916 re-admitting the appeal.

Babu Bimal Chandra Das Gupta, in reply.—As there was an exercise of jurisdiction by the Court, the subsequent order was erroneous. Without an application for review the Judge could not vacate his former order. Article 168 does not apply.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—This is a Rule calling on the opposite party to show cause why the order of the Officiating District Judge of Dacca, dated 2nd November 1916, should not be set aside.

The order was made in the following circumstances. The petitioner filed an appeal in the District Judge's Court on the 31st May 1916. On the 4th July 1916 she was directed under rule 10, Order XLI, to furnish security in the sum of Rs. 80 for the costs of the appeal and of the original suit. The time for furnishing security was more than once extended. On the 26th August 1916 the Officiating District Judge refused to extend the time further and dismissed the appeal under clause (2) of Order XLI, rule 10. On the 2nd November 1916, the petitioner applied for the re-admission of the appeal. By the first of the two orders made on that date, the Officiating District Judge directed that the appeal should be re-admitted if the amount of the security ordered were deposited in Court by the 8th November 1916. By the second order of the same date against which this Rule has been obtained, he rejected the application on the ground that it had just come to his notice that the application was time-barred by more than a month.

It is not disputed that the Judge had jurisdiction to re-admit the appeal after having dismissed it by an order under clause (2), rule 10, Order XLI.

It is argued for the petitioner that inasmuch as the Officiating District Judge had jurisdiction in the exercise of his powers to re-admit the appeal by his first order of the 2nd November, he was functus officio and had no power to pass the second order of the same day. It is further argued for the petitioner that the Officiating District Judge was wrong in deciding that the application was time-barred. Apparently the Officiating District Judge applied Article 168 of the Schedule of the Limitation Act. It is contended that that Article applies to an application made under rule 19, Order XLI, and has no application when an application is made to restore an appeal which has been dismissed under rule 10.

On the other hand, it is contended for the opposite party that both the first and second orders of the 2nd November 1916 were made by the Officiating District Judge without notice to them and that they are not bound by those orders. On the question of limitation, it is argued for the opposite party that the District Judge is right in applying Article 168 of the Schedule of the Limitation Act.

It seems to me that the contention of the opposite party that they are not bound by the order of the 2nd November 1916 re-admitting the appeal should be accepted. That raises the question whether this Court ought to exercise its revisional jurisdiction in the matter.

In regard to the question of limitation even if Article 168 does not apply to an application for the restoration of an appeal dismissed under rule 10, Order XLI, it is clear that such an application ought to be made within a reasonable time; and by analogy an application made after thirty days would ordinarily be an application unduly delayed.

The petitioner had had every opportunity of complying with the order for furnishing security and she did not apply to set aside the order dismissing the appeal till the 2nd November. As the Officiating District Judge has said, that was more than thirty days beyond the period allowed by Article 168. Whether the Article applies or not, the petitioner did not, in my opinion, act with due diligence in the matter. We have come to the conclusion that this Court ought not to interfere in this case.

In that view, the Rule should be discharged. We make no order as to costs.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree that the Rule should be discharged.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 23—Promissory note—Pannayal service, in lieu of interest—Public policy—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 68—Bond, suit on—Condition, breach of—Limitation.

The plaintiff lent a certain sum of money to the defendant, on condition that the latter should hand over three of his pannayals to work with plaintiff, that their services should be in lieu of interest on the money lent and that if the pannayals failed to do satisfactory work, the money should become payable. The pannayals left plaintiff's service and the plaintiff more than three years after brought a suit to recover the amount lent with interest:

Held, (1) that the transaction amounted to a transfer of possession of human cattle and was opposed to public policy and the money was, therefore, not recoverable; [p. 236, col. 1.]

(2) that the suit was barred by limitation as it was brought more than three years after the condition of the bond had been broken. [p. 236, col. 2.]

order, dated the 10th July 1915, of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruvalur, in Small Cause Suit No. 479 of 1915.

Mr. V. Raghavachariar for Mr. N. S. Rangaswami Aiyangar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. R. Rangachariar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a curious case. The defendant borrowed Rs. 40 from the plaintiff and pledged his farm servants, Karanapuram, his wife Veeri and his son Samudram, to the plaintiff on the 18th June 1899. The bond Exhibit A executed by the defendant to the plaintiff on that day recites that the defendant has handed over these people. The stipulation of the bond is that the plaintiff should take work from them in lieu of interest and if they failed to do satisfactory work, the defendant should pay the principal with interest at one per cent. per month. There is no other covenant to pay the debt.

There can be no doubt that the intention of the parties was to create a pledge of these persons as if they were cattle and the plaintiff frankly states that they were the defendant's bondsmen. Karanapuram died a few years after the pledge, and his wife Veeri did not work for the plaintiff afterwards. Samudram is said to have worked for the plaintiff till about a year before the suit, which was filed in April 1915. The plaintiff sues to recover the debt alleging his cause of action to be the failure of Samudram to work for him. The District Munsif dismissed the suit, holding that the transaction was opposed to public policy and also that the action was barred by limitation. It is argued for the plaintiff that in substance the transaction amounts only to a loan of the services of the defendant's servants—they need not do any service unless they chose—and there is nothing illegal or against public policy in the arrangement. It is nothing of the sort; the defendant does not pay their wages, they are to be paid by the plaintiff himself. The transaction in substance is what it purports to be, namely, a transfer of possession of the human cattle in consideration of the plaintiff lending Rs. 40 to the defendant. The plaintiff in fact pays for the defendant's proprietorship of these people. It is nothing to the purpose to say that these people in the eye of law are free people and that the defendant cannot in law have any right over them.

I am not desirous of inventing a new head of public policy, but this transaction falls within well-known heads as it practically enforces a state of slavery.

The other point is equally fatal to the suit. The cause of action to recover the money arose when Karanapuram died and his wife ceased to do work as the condition of the bond was broken then, as there can be no question of satisfactory work thereafter. That was much more than three years before the suit, as admitted by the plaintiff. In answer to this, it was said that as Samudram, the son, was working till within three years of the date of the suit, that amounts to payment of interest on the bond under section 20 of the Limitation Act. There was no such plea in the lower Court, there is no finding that Samudram did work and if he did, he worked in lieu of interest payable by the defendant. I reserved judgment in this case as it was said that my brother Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in a similar case from the same District Munsif held that the action was not barred. I have now looked into the papers (Civil Revision Petition No. 1022 of 1914) and the judgment and I find that that case was quite different. The defendant in that case borrowed some money from the plaintiff and agreed to render certain services in lieu of interest and did those services till within three years of the suit. Sadasiva Aiyar, J., held and, if I may say so with respect, quite correctly, that payment of interest need not be in money but may consist of money's worth.

There was no question of pledging men and there was no payment for services as there was in this case. Unlike this case the plea of acknowledgment of liability by payment was raised there. I, therefore, dismiss this petition with costs.

—Appeal—Practice—Respondent, whether can maintain decree on ground decided against him—Cross-objections —Suit for declaration of invalidity of gift—Non-ancestral property.

One B. made an oral gift of his landed property to his unmarried daughters and mutation of the gifted land was effected in favour of the donees. On B.'s death his collaterals in the sixth degree sued for a declaration to the effect that the gift made by B. to his daughters should not affect their reversionary rights after the death of the widow. The Subordinate Judge, holding that the land was ancestral but that by custom applicable to the parties the gift was valid, dismissed the suit. In appeal it was contended by the defendants that the plaintiffs had no locus standi to question the gift because the land in suit was not the ancestral property of B. The District Judge refused to hear arguments on the point because no cross-objections had been filed against the finding that the land was ancestral:

Held, (1) that the decree of the Subordinate Judge being one dismissing the suit, the defendants in their capacity of respondents in the District Judge's Court were entitled to maintain that decree upon any ground decided against them by the Subordinate Judge without filing any cross-objections under Order XLI, rule 22, Civil Procedure Code, and that the District Judge acted illegally in declining to hear arguments on the question whether the land in dispute was ancestral or not: [p. 238, col. 1,]

(2) that the evidence on the record was insufficient to prove that the land was ancestral and that the plaintiffs' suit was, therefore, liable to be dismissed upon this ground alone. [p. 238, col. 2.]

for the Appellants.

Mr. Ganpat Rai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In the year 1909 one Budha Singh, a Wirk Jat of Mauza Chak Bhera in Tehsil Lahore, made an oral gift of half of his landed property to his unmarried daughters, Musammât Parsani and Musammât Natho. The gift was reported to the patwari shortly after but the mutation proceedings were protracted for certain reasons, which it is unnecessary to state here; and the final mutation order was not passed until 5th June 1912. By that order mutation of the land gifted was made in favour of the donees.

Meanwhile Budha Singh died leaving a widow Musammât Bishen Kaur; and in August 1912, the present plaintiffs, who are collaterals of Budha Singh in the sixth degree, brought a suit for a declaration to the effect that the gift made by Budha Singh to his daughters should not affect their reversionary rights after the death of the widow. It may be stated here that one of the daughters was married before the suit was brought, and the other has been married since the institution of the suit. Further, one of the plaintiffs' brothers, namely, Didar Singh refused to join with them in the suit as a co-plaintiff, and so he has been added as a co-defendant with the donees.

The defendants pleaded inter alia that the land in suit was not ancestral qua the plaintiffs, and that the gift was valid by custom because (a) it was made by the deceased proprietor in favour of his daughters and the resident son-in-law in lieu of services rendered to him; and (b) the daughters were the heirs of the deceased in preference to the plaintiffs. Upon the pleadings of the parties, the Subordinate Judge framed five issues, the first, second and fifth of which related to the alleged non-ancestral character of the land and to the question of custom involved in the case. The Subordinate Judge held that the land was ancestral, but that by custom applicable to the parties the gift in favour of the daughters was valid, inasmuch as they were unmarried at the time of the gift and subsequently when one of them was married her husband resided in the donor's house since the date of the marriage. On this ground the Subordinate Judge dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

On appeal by the plaintiffs the learned District Judge differed from the Subordinate Judge on the question of custom, holding that the daughters of Budha Singh on whom the onus lay had failed to prove that by custom applicable to them, the land in dispute could be gifted to them by their father in the presence of the plaintiffs. On behalf of the daughters it was contended that, apart from the alleged invalidity of the gift, the plaintiffs had no locus standi to question it because the land gifted was not the ancestral property of Budha Singh qua the plaintiffs. But the learned District Judge refused to hear arguments on this point, because on behalf of the daughters no cross-objection against the Subordinate Judge's finding that the land was ancestral had been filed. It is clear that the District Judge was in error in shutting out the defendants' contention on the ground stated; the decree of the Subordinate Judge being one dismissing the suit, the defendants in their capacity of respondents in the District Judge's Court could have maintained that decree upon any ground decided against them by the Subordinate Judge without filing any cross-objections under Order XL1, rule 22, Civil Procedure Code.

The District Judge, having decreed the suit of the plaintiffs, granted a certificate for second appeal to the defendants under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act, and in virtue of that certificate the present appeal was filed in this Court. The first point raised by the Counsel for the appellants is that the District Judge acted illegally in declining to hear arguments on the question whether the land in dispute was ancestral or not, and that since the evidence on the record is insufficient to prove that the land is ancestral, the respondents' suit must be dismissed upon this ground alone. In the view that I take of the case in connection with the point thus raised it is unnecessary for me to consider and decide the question of custom involved, which was also argued before me at some length. It seems to me that the Subordinate Judge was not justified in holding, upon the material on the record, that the land gifted by Budha Singh to the respondents had been proved to be his ancestral property qua the plaintiffs. As has been stated above, the plaintiffs are Budha Singh's collaterals in the sixth degree; and it is not denied that so far as the entries in the revenue records go, there was no direct proof of the land in question being ever held by Shian, the common ancestor of the parties. The facts noticed by the Subordinate Judge that, according to the entries of the Settlement of 1856, the sons of Bakshish (see copy of the pedigree on the record) and the father of Budha Singh deceased held equal shares of land in the village is clearly insufficient itself to prove that the land gifted by Budha Singh to the respondents was at one time held by Shian and had descended from him through five generations to Budha Singh. There is no other evidence of any description to prove the ancestral character of the land in question, and I must hold that it is not proved that the land was the ancestral property of Budha Singh qua the present respondents.

This finding is sufficient for the disposal of the case. I accordingly accept this appeal and setting aside the decree of the District Judge restore that of the Subordinate Judge with costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

Rent suit—Rent, reduction of, claim for, on ground whether can be allowed in suit for rent.*

Where the defendant (ryot), who had accepted a patta and had also executed a muchilika without objection agreeing to pay the rent claimed by the plaintiff, claimed a reduction on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to repair the well on the land and rendered him unable to raise the garden crops for the cultivation of which the rent had been fixed:

Held, that the defendant's plea for reduction of rent on the ground of failure of water supply was in the nature of an equitable set-off, being in effect a claim for damages in respect of the contract to cultivate, and was, therefore, barred under section 192 (c) of the Madras Estates Land Act, 1908.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Tinnevely, in Appeal Suit No. 111 of 1914, preferred against that of the Court of the Honorary Deputy Collector, Tinnevely, in Summary Suit No. 302 of 1913.

VENA SUBBARAYULU NAIDU v. SUBBARAYALU NAIDU.

Mr. K. Bhashyam Aiyangar for Mr. K. Rajah Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In defending a suit for rent, appellant alleged that the rent was not due, because respondent had failed to repair the well on the land and consequently he (appellant) had been unable to raise the garden crops for the cultivation of which the rent had been fixed. The first Court allowed an abatement of rent, but the lower Appellate Court disallowed appellant's contention because under section 38 of the Estates Land Act he could and should have applied to the Collector for a reduction of rent.

Patta was accepted by defendant for Fasli 1318 and a muchilika executed; and similar pattas were tendered for *Fasli*s 1319 to 1321 (the suit period) and were not objected to. It must be taken, therefore, that there was a contract between the parties, under which the appellant was bound to pay the rent now claimed. His plea for reduction of rent on the ground of failure of water supply is undoubtedly in the nature of an equitable set-off, for, in effect, it is a claim for damages in respect of the contract to cultivate, for into that contract appellant wishes to import another contract that the landlord was to repair the well which irrigated the land. In the language of Scotland, C. J., in Stephen Clark v. Ruthnavaloo Chetti (1), "the right of set-off will be found to exist not only in cases of mutual debts and credits, but also where the cross-demands arise out of one and the same transaction, or are so connected in their nature and circumstances as to make it inequitable that the plaintiff should recover and the defendant be driven to a cross suit." In this case defendant's plea undoubtedly amounts to an equitable set-off and as such is barred under section 192 (e) of the Act.

In this view it is unnecessary to discuss the larger question of whether, apart from the question of set-off, defendant is precluded by the provisions of the Act from setting up in defence to a suit for rent, a right which he is specifically allowed by the Act to enforce by suit or otherwise.

The District Judge has not recorded any finding on the question whether two instalments of rent for Fasli 1319 are barred by limitation. The appeal is accordingly remanded for a finding on this point. The finding should be submitted within six weeks from this date, and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the District Judge of Tinnevely submitted the following FINDING.—It is directed that finding be submitted on the evidence on record on the issue whether two instalments of rent for Fasli 1319 are barred by limitation. It is alleged in paragraph 10 of the plaint that the plaint was instituted by calculating all the arrears as a single arrear, consistently with the action of the plaintiff complying with the request of the defendants that they should be permitted to pay them as a whole at the end of every fasli. The agent of the plaintiff (his first witness) states that the ryots of the village had agreed to pay the rent for the whole fasli in a lump at the close of the fasli. The payment of interest for the previous instalments was not always insisted upon, although the landlord had the right to do so. He also stated that Subbarayulu Naidu (the defendant) requested the landlord to allow him to pay the rent for the whole fasli at the end of the fasli in his presence and the landlord agreed to it for Fasli 1319. There is no evidence to the contrary. The lower Court does not believe that this request was made by the defendant because of the state of the relations between the parties. But there is no evidence that at that time the relations between the parties were strained. If the agreement to pay at the end of the fasli be believed, the arrears for two instalments for Fasli 1319 are not barred by limitation. On the evidence I find that the agreement is proved and that the two instalments are not barred by limitation.

This second appeal came on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Appellate Court upon the issue referred by this Court for trial on 5th April 1916.

JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding and dismiss the second appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

One L., who made a living by piri muridi and owned in a graveyard the tomb of an ancestor of his, executed a Will whereby he left the whole of his property to his wife with a reversion after her death to her brother K. He also appointed K. manager of the estate on behalf of his wife after his death and also his own successor and representative for the continuation of the urs and for carrying out the duties and receiving the offerings connected with the piri muridi. On his death his daughter by an earlier wife sued for possession of her share of the property:

Held, that there was nothing to show that the testator appointed K. sajjada nashin in the usual acceptance of the term or that the property in dispute was ever dedicated to the upkeep of the shrine, but that it was held by the testator in proprietary right and not as a keeper of the shrine and that the plaintiff was entitled to her share under the Muhammadan Law. [p. 241, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Montgomery, dated the 23rd January 1914, dismissing plaintiff's claim.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., and Mr. Nur ul-Din, for the Appellant.

Dr. Muhammad Iqbal and Sayed Mohsin Shah, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Ilahi Bakhsh, a Kureshi who resided at Pakpatan town, made a living by piri muridi and owned in a graveyard outside the city of Pakpatan the tomb of Hafiz Kaim, his ancestor. On the 12th of July 1910 he executed a Will whereby he left the whole of his property to his wife, Musammât Emna Bibi, with reversion after her death to her brother Karam Din. In the said Will he appointed the said Karam Din manager of the estate on behalf of his sister after the death of the testator, and further he appointed Karam Din as his successor and representative for the continuation of the urs or death day festival of Hafiz Kaim and also for carrying out the duties and receiving the offerings connected with the piri muridi. Having made this Will he died some eight months later, and his wife and her brother took possession of his estate.

The present suit was brought by Musammât Zinat Bibi, daughter of the testator by an earlier wife, and it has been defended by Karam Din, brother-in-law of the testator, alone, for Musammât Emna the widow has let the case proceed against her ex parte. The Court below has dismissed the suit, holding that Muhammadan Law is not the rule of succession followed by this family, that the testator held the position of gaddi nashin and that Karam Din having been nominated by the deceased as his successor to the gaddi was entitled to the succession. The property left by the testator, apart from moveable property, consists of a pacca house, a house known as dera, a two-storied shop, all these three being situated within the town of Pakpatan, and finally, the rauza or tomb of Hafiz Kaim situate in a graveyard lying outside the city walls.

For all practical purposes there is but one issue in the case, and that is whether this immoveable property was attached to the tomb of Hafiz Kaim and whether the testator held it as keeper of the tomb or whether he held it in full proprietary right, and on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant it was strenuously urged that inasmuch as prima facie the property was private property and the burden of proving any particular fact lies on the person who wishes the Court to believe in its existence, the burden of proof should have been laid upon the defendant in the first instance. It is to be noted that the defendant-respondent does not rely at all upon the Will executed by the testator, for obviously that would not suit his purpose. His contention is that the testator had no power to dispose of the property by Will and that defendant is entitled to it not by inheritance but as the testator's nominated successor in the office of sajjada nashin of the shrine. The oral evidence is voluminous but, in our opinion, very untrustworthy, for in most cases it represents merely the opinions of the persons who gave it and who from their own evidence clearly are little qualified to give any opinion at all in the matter. If the testator can be called sajjada nashin of the tomb, such a title can be recorded only as a courtesy title, for the tomb or the shrine cannot by any stretch of language be regarded as a public religious institution. As stated before, it consists of an old tomb in the last stages of disrepair, in the neighbourhood of which there is neither well nor shop nor refuges for the accommodation of any pilgrims; and it is in evidence that only once a year, viz., on the death day of Hafiz Kaim did persons proceed to the spot. Estimates of the persons who so attended vary extensively from 100 to 1000, but it is quite clear that the tomb lay deserted except for one or at most two days during the year and that it was not a regular place of pilgrimage. It appears to be merely the tomb of a deputed saintly man whose descendants make a little money from the offerings received there during one day in the year. Such a tomb cannot be compared in any respects, especially in respect of the rules governing the rights in it, with the large institutions which are presided over by mahants who in their turn are controlled by brotherhoods. Such a comparison in a case of this kind would be quite fallacious. On behalf of the defendant-respondent it has been urged that the tomb was originally owned by Sayyids and that the testator and his father came into possession of it not in accordance with the rules of ordinary succession but as murids or disciples and successors of the first sajjada nashin. That Hafiz Kaim, whose remains are said to be covered by the tomb in question, was a Sayyid is, however, not proved, for whilst plaintiff asserts that Hafiz Kaim was a Kureshi, the defendant avers that he was a Sayyid. The only piece of documentary evidence upon the record, an old sale-deed, which is more than thirty years old and which appears to be prima facie genuine, shows that Pir Bakhsh was the son of Ghulam Resul; and we are quite unable to find it established that Hafiz Kaim Din was a Sayyid and was not a Kureshi and the blood ancestor of the testator. That being so, the respondent's argument that the testator received this property from Hafiz Kaim Din as the keeper of the shrine and not in absolute proprietary right falls to the ground. The plaintiff and the testator are Kureshis by caste, and as regards them there exists a strong presumption that they followed Muhammadan Law. The site of the tomb is recorded in the revenue papers as the personal property of the testator and it is therein described merely as a graveyard, and not as a shrine. If we turn now to the Will executed by the testator, we find that the whole of the property including the tomb and its site is therein described as the personal property of the testator and he proceeds to dispose of it as such, leaving it in the first instance to his wife and after her death to the respondent. In his Will he does not describe himself as sajjada nashin nor does he describe the respondent as his successor in the sajjada nashini, but he does describe him as his representative and successor in the piri muridi and in the celebration of the urs.

Respondent himself does not contend that the property is wakf. Indeed, he asserts that it is not wakf and drawing a distinction, which we find to be too fine to appreciate, asserts that the property though not wakf is attached to the shrine.

Our conclusion then is that there is no reason to hold that the property in dispute is not the personal property of the testator, that there is no proof that the testator appointed the defendant sajjada nashin in the usual acceptance of the term, and that there is no proof that the property was ever dedicated to the upkeep of the shrine or that, in fact, the income of the property was used for the upkeep of the shrine. But we find it proved that the property was held by the testator in proprietary right.

On these findings we accept the appeal and decree the plaintiff's claim with costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 274, 276, 295—Execution—Attachment—Sale of attached property by judgment-debtor—Subsequent attachment and sale of same property in execution of another decree—Execution purchaser and private purchaser, rights of Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 53—Fraudulent transfer—Preferential payment to creditor, whether fraudulent—Document, execution of—Date—Presumption—Judgment—Evidence, nature of.

Where certain immoveable properties of a judgment-debtor were successively attached in execution of two decrees held by the same decree-holder and were sold under the second attachment and purchased by the decree-holder himself and it was also found that on the day previous to the second attachment in pursuance whereof the execution sale was held, the judgment-debtor had conveyed the properties absolutely to the plaintiff by a private sale:

Held, in a suit by the plaintiff to recover possession of the properties,

(1) that the private sale, being prior to the second attachment, took effect in preference to the Court sale. [p. 244, col. 2.]

(2) that under section 276 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, the decree-holder could not take advantage of any attachment other than the one which actually led up to the sale and that, therefore, the decree-holder could not avail himself of the first and earlier attachment in execution of his earlier decree to render the sale to the plaintiff void. [p. 245, col. 1.]

Held, also (1) that the existence of assets in Court was a condition precedent to bring section 295 of the Code into play and there being none such in the case, the decree-holder was not entitled to rateable distribution; [p. 245, col. 2.]

(2), that even assuming that section 295 could apply and the conditions required by that section were fulfilled, the decree-holder could not under section 276 of the Code take advantage of any attachment other than the one which actually led up to the sale. [p. 245, col. 2.]

Where a purchaser in Court auction questions the validity of a prior private sale on the ground that it was either benami or fraudulent, but admits that the vendor owed the private purchaser more than the actual consideration for the sale, the admission is a complete answer to the plea of benami and also operates strongly against the plea of fraudulent transfer. [p. 244, col. 2.]

For all that is contained in section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, a debtor may pay his debts in any order he pleases and prefer any creditor he chooses. [p. 244, col. 2.]

The mere fact that a debtor prefers one of his many creditors and executes a conveyance to him of his properties and does so of set purpose, would not stamp the transaction as a fraudulent transfer within the meaning of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. [p. 244, col. 2.]

It is a general though not a conclusive presumption that a document was made on the day of the date it bears. [p. 244, col. 2.]

A Court's decision must rest not upon suspicion but upon legal grounds established by legal testimony. [p. 245, col. 1.]

Appeal from the judgment and decree of the Calcutta High Court (Chitty and Teunon, JJ.), dated the 26th March 1912, reversing those of the Subordinate Judge, Murshidabad at Berhampur.

FACTS of the case appear fully from the judgment.

Messrs. Upjohn, K. C., and Sir William Garth, for the Appellant.—The judgment of the Subordinate Judge was right and ought not to have been reversed. There is absolutely no evidence that the document was antedated and the judgment of the High Court on this point is based on mere suspicion. The pleas of benami and fraud are completely answered by the defendant's admission that the judgment-debtor owed to the plaintiff more than the consideration for the sale. These grounds were not taken in the written statements and there were no issues joined thereon. They ought not to have been allowed by the High Court. See Bal Gangadhar Tilak v. Shri Shrinivas Pandit (1).

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Bhugwandin Dube, for the Respondent, contended that the plaintiff's sales were collusive and fictitious and were proved to be so by the record. The evidence also proved their being antedated. The earlier attachment of 1902 was then subsisting and the sale was, therefore, also inoperative.

[Mr. Upjohn, objected to the last point on the ground that it was not pressed before the High Court but Mr. De Gruyther contended that it would be open to him, even though abandoned by his legal advisers in the High Court as it was raised in the written statement and was a point of law. Their Lordships overruled the objection.]

execution of his earlier decree was subsisting at the time of the sale. See Sorabji Edulji v. Govind Ramji (2). See also section 73 of Act V of 1908.

Their Lordships did not want to hear appellant's Counsel on facts.

Mr. Upjohn, K. C., in reply (on the point of law).—In order to entitle the respondent to avoid appellant's sale under section 273, Civil Procedure Code, 1882, the attachment must be the one which led up to the sale in his favour. That attachment was subsequent to the sale to the appellant. There being admittedly no assets in Court, section 295, Civil-Procedure Code, does not apply. In any event the earlier attachment was abandoned long ago and ought not to be held subsisting on the date of the sale to the appellant.

JUDGMENT.

SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS.—This is a suit for the possession of immoveable property brought by a purchaser under a private alienation against a purchaser at an execution sale, who was also the decree-holder, and against the judgment-debtor. There was also originally another defendant, but he has since died and is now represented by the decree-holder.

The suit was decided in the plaintiff's favour in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Berhampur, but on appeal it was dismissed with costs by the High Court of Calcutta. From the High Court's decree the present appeal has been preferred to His Majesty in Council.

The judgment debtor is Chhatrapat Singh Dugar, who is not inexperienced in litigation. Two decrees were passed against him in the High Court of Calcutta on its original side, one on the 24th August 1896, in Suit No. 449 of 1896, the other on the 3rd January 1901, in Suit No. 302 of 1900. The defendant, Raja Bijoy Singh Dudhuria, the purchaser at the execution sale, was a transferee of both decrees, and so became the decree-holder under each.

It will be convenient to trace briefly the history of these decrees, both of which were sent for execution to the Court of the District Judge of Murshidabad.

On the 13th June 1902, an application was made at Murshidabad by the decree-holder for execution of the decree of 1896, and the proceedings became execution case No. 8 of 1902.

On the 12th July 1902, an order of attachment was made under section 274, Civil Procedure Code, prohibiting the judgment-debtor from alienating the property there specified until any other order should be passed by that Court.

The proceedings were protracted by adverse claims, but ultimately on the 29th March 1905, the following order was recorded:—
“Nothing further can be done in this case at present. The application for execution is accordingly dismissed with the consent of the decree-holder. Certify result to the High Court, Original Side.”

Though this does not appear on the record, it may be assumed that the Murshidabad Court certified the result to the High Court, in accordance with the provisions of the Code (section 223).

On the 26th July 1907, another application, No. 19 of 1907, was made to the Murshidabad Court for execution of the decree of 1896, and here, too, it may be assumed that an order was made by the High Court for the transmission of the decree. The order made on the application was, “Now issue warrant of attachment. Returnable on 16th August.”

On the 29th July 1907, at the decree-holder's instance, the issue of the warrant of attachment was stayed, and a direction given for the issue of notice to the judgment-debtor to show cause, on the 16th August, why the properties should not be advertised for sale.

On the 16th August the decree-holder applied for the issue of a sale proclamation, “the attachment being taken to have subsisted since the order passed on the 27th March 1905, on his previous application for sale of the same properties. . . . Previous to that order there had been an order passed on the 20th March 1905, directing that the ‘sale of the (other) property now for sale here is postponed indefinitely.’”

Notwithstanding Chhatrapat's opposition, the District Judge held that the application No. 19 of 1907 must be received as one in continuation of the former proceedings, that the properties were still under attachment and that a sale proclamation might issue without the property again being attached. Though on the face of things it seemed no real concern of his, still Chhatrapat appealed, but the order was affirmed by the High Court. So much, then, for the proceedings under the decree of 1896.

Under the other decree, that of 1901, an application for execution, No. 16 of 1907, was made by the decree-holder on the 16th July 1907, in the Murshidabad Court. Notice was issued, and on the 24th July 1907, an order was made for the issue of a warrant of attachment. On the 23rd August 1907 attachment was effected. A claim was preferred by the present plaintiff, but the property was sold in execution, notwithstanding her opposition, the purchaser being the decree-holder, in whose favour an order had been made, allowing the purchase-money to be set off against the decretal amount, which was considerably in excess of the price.

The private alienation under which the plaintiff derives title was effected by two sale-deeds expressed to be executed in her favour on the 15th July 1907 by the judgment-debtor. The question in this litigation is which of the two titles is to be preferred, the plaintiff's or the decree-holder's.

The plaintiff alleges that hers is the earlier, and that the judgment-debtor had no right, title, or interest in the property in suit at the date of the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907, under which the decree-holder bought. The plaintiff also questions, with certain exceptions, the identity of the property in the two sales, but in the view their Lordships take, this topic need not be pursued. The decree-holder denies the plaintiff's priority of title, and contends that the assurances to her were collusive and fictitious; that the sale-deeds, though purporting to be of a date prior to the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907, were in truth executed later; and that in any case the private alienation to the plaintiff was during the continuance of an attachment, and, therefore, void. First, then, as to the alienation in favour of the plaintiff being, as it is termed in the respondent's case, collusive and fictitious. It is there alleged that "the judgment-debtor, Babu Chhatrapat Singh, was, and always remained, the real owner of the properties in dispute." Strictly this means that the transaction was benami, and not that it was a fraudulent transfer within the meaning of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. The difference is distinct, though it is often slurred. To the suggestion that the transaction was benami, a complete answer is furnished by the admission that the judgment-debtor owed the plaintiff the amount stated to be the consideration for the sale-deeds and more.

And even if the case for the decree-holder be treated as raising the further plea of a fraudulent transfer, this same admission operates strongly in the plaintiff's favour.

It may be that the judgment-debtor preferred the plaintiff, with whom he was connected by family ties, and that he did this of set purpose, yet this would not stamp the transaction as a fraudulent transfer. A debtor, for all that is contained in section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, may pay his debts in any order he pleases, and prefer any creditor he chooses. And whatever may be suspected and however slender the confidence that Chhatrapat may inspire, there is no evidence on which any fraudulent intention can be imputed to the plaintiff.

Had it been made out that the sale-deeds to the plaintiff were really executed after the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907, then there would have been justification for a finding of fraud; though in that case the finding would have been unnecessary, for the plaintiff's title would have been defeated, apart from fraud, under the express terms of section 276 of the Civil Procedure Code.

But the contention that the sale-deeds were antedated cannot be sustained. It is a general though not a conclusive presumption that a document was made on the day of the date it bears, so that for what it is worth the plaintiff starts with that in her favour; but her case does not rest there, for such oral evidence as there is on the point supports the presumption, and was not seriously challenged by cross-examination. It has been suggested that the plaintiff should have called other witnesses to the date of execution. But her advisers had no reason to apprehend that this contention would be advanced. It is not pleaded in the written statement, it is not raised in the issues, and the judgment of the first Court certainly does not suggest that it was given prominence even at the trial.

There may be ground for suspicion, and Chhatrapat's treatment of his creditors in the past may engender doubt, but the Court's decision must rest, not upon suspicion, but upon legal grounds established by legal testimony. Such as it is, the legal proof here is all on the plaintiff's side, while if indirect signs are sought the keenness which marked the contest as to the continuation of the execution proceedings No. 8 of 1902 is hardly intelligible unless it be assumed that both parties realised the importance of the dates, and the dates could only have possessed importance if the sale-deeds had been already executed.

But then it is urged for the decree-holder that the sales to the plaintiff, even if executed on the date the kobalas bear, are nevertheless void under section 276 of the Civil Procedure Code. That section provides that when an attachment has been made as there described, any private alienation of the property attached during the continuance of the attachment shall be void against all claims enforceable under the attachment. Ex hypothesi, the alienation to the plaintiff was not during the continuance of the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907, or, in other words, the attachment under which the execution sale to the decree-holder was made. Therefore, it cannot be avoided by that attachment.

But the decree-holder argues that it was made during the continuance of the attachment in execution case No. 8 of 1902, and in support of this, reliance is placed on the order of the District Judge of the 16th August 1907, which was affirmed on appeal by the High Court.

The plaintiff is not bound by those decisions, and their correctness has been forcibly questioned before their Lordships. But it is unnecessary and inadvisable to deal further with this point, and more especially as there is another and surer answer to the decree-holder's plea. He relies on section 295 of the Code of Civil Procedure as entitling him to the benefit of section 276, and for this purpose he calls in aid his application for attachment in execution case No. 8 of 1902. To bring section 295 into play certain conditions are necessary, and one of them is that there should be assets held by the Court. It has not been shown that there were such assets and the indications in the record point the other way. But apart from this, section 295 cannot help the decree-holder. Though the word "attachment" occurs three times in section 276, the reference is to one, and only one attachment; that one in this case is the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907. All that can be done is to employ that attachment for the purpose of impugning the private alienation, for it is on that alone that the decree-holder's title to the property in suit at present rests. So that even if it be assumed, for the sake of argument, that the view which prevailed in Sorabji Edulji v. Govind Ramji (2) is correct, and that the conditions of section 295 have been satisfied, it cannot advance the decree-holder's case.

It still is the attachment in execution case No. 16 of 1907 that is the only weapon of attack, and it is not made more effective by the earlier attachment in execution case No. 8 of 1902. All that the earlier attachment can do in the circumstances of this case is to entitle the decree-holder to the benefit of the later attachment. He cannot claim to be in a better position than the decree-holder in execution case No. 16 of 1907, nor does it strengthen his position that it is the same person who is the decree-holder in both cases. To claim a higher right because the attachment in execution case No. 8 of 1902 is of an earlier date rests on an obvious confusion of thought.

The result then is that the appeal must be allowed, the decree of the High Court set aside, and the decree of the Subordinate Judge, so far as it directs that the plaintiff do get khas possession of the properties in suit, restored with costs in both Courts, and any costs paid under the decree of the High Court must be refunded and the costs of this appeal paid by the decree-holder.

The universal rule of Punjab agricultural custom is that a widow in the absence of male issue succeeds to a life-interest in her deceased husband's estate. [p. 246, col. 2.]

She is entitled to the enjoyment of the whole of the income of the estate and is not bound to account for her expenditure to possible reversioners. [p. 247, col. 1.]

Where the reversioners of one A, a member of the Bhopla tribe in the Multan Tahsil, sued his widow for possession of the property left by the deceased or in the alternative for an injunction restraining her from wasting the estate, alleging that according to the custom of the tribe the widow was entitled only to maintenance:

Held, that the plaintiffs had failed to establish the custom set up by them. [p. 247, col. 1.]

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., and Sheikh Muhammad Bakhsh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 20th September 1907 died Ahamd Bakhsh of the Bhopla tribe of Tahsil Multan, leaving a considerable estate. Plaintiffs are his collaterals, whilst the chief defendants are respectively the widow, the minor daughter and the mother of the deceased, and the claim brought by the plaintiffs is that these defendants are not entitled to the succession but only to maintenance. Consequently the plaintiffs ask for possession and failing that pray for an injunction restraining the defendants from wasting the estate. Plaintiffs based their claim to the relief on the assertion that the parties are governed by their own tribal and general custom and that defendant No. 1 was wasting the estate. Defendants traversed all the allegations of the plaintiffs and denied their locus standi to bring the suit in the presence of the daughter of the last male owner. The most important issues in the case are whether the property in suit is ancestral and whether the widow, Musammât Karm Ilahi, is entitled solely to maintenance and not to possession of her deceased husband's estate. The lower Court has found that only the properties marked Nos. 3, 4, 5, 8, 13 and 16 are ancestral, that there is no proof that the widow was wasting the property, that the plaintiffs have failed to establish a custom whereby among them a widow fails to succeed to her husband's estate and is entitled only to maintenance and that the plaintiffs, who are removed by more than three generations from the deceased, have no locus standi in the presence of the daughter.

We have considered carefully the various instances of the operation of custom cited by the two parties, and as a result we find ourselves in agreement with the Court below that the plaintiffs have not succeeded in establishing the custom propounded by them, custom which is certainly at variance with the almost universal Punjab agricultural custom that a widow in the absence of male issue succeeds to a life-interest in her deceased husband's estate.

On behalf of the plaintiffs-appellants it was urged that the riwaj-i-am of the Multan Tahsil favoured their contention and that the instances produced by the defendants, which appear to be contrary to the custom set forth in the riwaj-i-am, were cases of recent date which were still open to challenge and which dealt with only quite small estates. With regard to the riwaj-i-am entry, we find that the riwaj-i-am of the Multan Tehsil was compiled more than 35 years ago and the replies to the question indicate that there was a considerable diversity of opinion among the various tribes regarding the custom which prevailed in the cases propounded in them. The riwaj-i-am, or rather that portion of it upon which the appellants rely, is printed at page 6 of the paper-book and its meaning, as contended for by the appellants, is that a widow in the presence of collaterals is entitled to maintenance only. The reply, however, must be construed as being strictly limited to the case which is set out in the question, and the question evidently contemplates the death of a sonless proprietor leaving a widow as also a brother or brother's sons. In such a case, says the riwaj-i-am the widow is entitled only to maintenance. Such, however, is not the set of facts with which we have to deal in this case, for Ahmad Bakhsh died without leaving any brother or brother's sons. His nearest relatives are the plaintiffs who are the descendants of his great-grandfather and are, therefore, related to him in the fourth degree. Consequently the riwaj-i-am establishes nothing in favour of the appellants and it is noteworthy that in all the cases quoted by them which they have succeeded in establishing, the widows have given way not to collaterals but to brothers or brothers' sons of the deceased.

Finding as we do that the plaintiffs have not proved the custom propounded by them and that the widow of Ahmad Bakhsh is entitled to a life-interest in the estate, we see no necessity to decide the other questions debated in the Court below except that dealing with the alleged waste by the widow. Before us Mr. Fazl-i-Hussain on behalf of the appellants has been forced to admit that he can point to no proof of waste except this, that the widow professes to have spent the whole of her income from the estate but can give no details of the channels down which the money disappeared. To this, it is a sufficient reply that the widow is entitled to the enjoyment of the whole of the income of the estate and is not bound to account for her expenditure to possible reversioners. The question whether the daughter of Ahmad Bakhsh was the next heir after her mother's demise was put in issue solely with reference to the objection that in the presence of the daughter the plaintiffs had no locus standi to sue either for possession or for an injunction. This issue, however, since we find that the plaintiffs are not on the merits entitled to a decree either for possession or for an injunction, we see no adequate necessity for deciding.

We find, therefore, that the widow is entitled to retain possession of her husband's property during her lifetime and that no waste of the estate by her has been established; and on these findings we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MALAMMAL KOO'ANCHERI KUNCHUKUTTI AMMA AND OTHERS—
DEFENDANTS NOS. 1, 2, 12 TO 24, 26 AND 27—
RESPONDENTS.

Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act (Mad. Act I of 1900), ss. 4, 5, 10, 19—Trees of spontaneous growth—Compensation—Right of jenmi to value of trees cut by tenant—Agreement enabling jenmi to cut and remove trees, validity of.

There is nothing in the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act of 1900 which deals or was intended to deal with the transfer of ownership in trees of spontaneous growth from the jenmi to the tenant. The Act is confined to the question of compensation. The Act awards compensation to the tenant in respect of all spontaneously grown timber left on the holding on ejectment which came into existence either during the term of the tenant or that of his predecessor, provided that no compensation has already been paid for it. [p. 250, col. 2.]

A contract entered into after 1886, which allows the landlord to come on the land and cut and remove spontaneously grown trees, is void as it contravenes the provisions of the Act. [p. 251, col. 1.]

NARAYANI AMMA v. KUNCHUKUTTI AMMA.

During the continuance of the tenancy the tenant is entitled to cut down trees in the ordinary course of prudent forestry, though they may belong to the landlord. [p. 251, col. 1.]

Quere:—Whether trees of spontaneous growth in Malabar before Madras Act I of 1900 was passed belong to the jenmi or the tenant?

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Palghat, in Appeal Suit No. 1057 of 1913, preferred against that of the District Munsif, Ottapalam, in Original Suit No. 331 of 1912.

FACTS.—This was a suit to redeem a kanom of 1895 (which itself was a renewal of a kanom of 1887, which in its turn was a renewal of an earlier kanom of 1873), under which the defendants Nos. 1 to 10 held the properties under the plaintiffs. The principal questions in dispute were whether (1) the plaintiffs-jenmies or the defendants-kanomdars were entitled to the value of certain trees of spontaneous growth which had been cut and removed by the defendants from the holding and (2) whether the defendants-kanomdars were entitled to compensation for other trees of spontaneous growth which were still standing on the land. The determination of these questions depended on the effect of the undermentioned clause in the kanom document and of the provisions of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Acts, 1887 and 1900. The clause referred to was as follows:—“As parambas Nos. 3 and 4 of the schedule are forest plots, all the teak, rosewood trees, etc., which are in them now, having grown there spontaneously and which are yet to grow belong to you, and they can be cut and removed for your purposes.”

Messrs. J. L. Rosario and K. Kuttikrishna Menon, for the Appellants.

Mr. K. P. M. Menon and T. Eroman Unni, for the Respondents.

This second appeal coming on for hearing and having stood over for consideration till the 21st March 1916, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS TROTTER, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Palghat. The suit was brought to redeem a kanom demise, dated the 20th October 1895. The kanom demise was in renewal of prior demises dating from 1887 and 1873. So that while the actual contract of tenancy out of which the suit arises dates from 1895, the defendants or their predecessors-in-title may in some sense be said to have been tenants of the plaintiffs since 1873.

The first point raised in the appeal was as to the identity of certain lands sought to be redeemed. Mr. Rosario very rightly admitted that this part of his case ultimately required that we should accept the plan put forward as Exhibit I as being more correct and reject the other plan referred to by the Subordinate Judge in his judgment. In so far as it was a question of deciding which of the two plans was the more correct, it was obviously unarguable, for the learned Judge has expressly decided that the second plan was more reliable than the first. But Mr. Rosario went further and contended that the second plan was not admissible at all, because it had been prepared not for the purposes of this case but for those of a connected case, Original Suit No. 331 of 1912. I do not think that this contention can possibly be upheld. It is quite obvious that the second plan was put in in the present suit and if it was not proved strictly, I assume it to be because the parties who were aware that it had been proved formally in the earlier suit took no objection to its being used and treated as evidence in this case. I should be very reluctant to come to any other conclusion on this matter. One plan is made by a Vakil and the second by a competent surveyor and one has only to glance at the two to see which is the more likely to be correct.

The next point taken by Mr. Rosario raises questions of interest and difficulty. The kychit of 1887 contains the following clause: “Without making such a payment (i. e., of the seigniorage) to you for your jenm right and satisfying you, no trees will be cut.” This seems to imply that the jenmi had rights of ownership in the trees. But it is not necessary to consider this matter, because the really material clause is the clause in the later kychit of 1895, which deals much more explicitly with the subject of trees and it is this clause which in my view decides the rights of the parties.

NARAYANI AMMA v. KUNCHUKUTTI AMMA.

It is as follows: "As parambas Nos. 3 and 4 of the schedule are forest plots, all the teak, rosewood trees, etc., which are in them now, having grown there spontaneously and which are yet to grow belong to you and they can be cut and removed for your purposes." The dispute which has arisen between the parties relates to certain trees which must be taken to have grown spontaneously on the property, some during the currency of the present tenancy, i.e., since 1395, others between 1873 and 1895. The tenants just before the expiration of the tenancy cut down and removed a large quantity of these trees and the landlord claims that they all belonged to him either at common law or by virtue of the terms of the kychit. A further question arises with relation to other trees of spontaneous growth which the tenants left standing on the property and for which they have been awarded compensation under the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Acts of 1887 and 1900.

The Act of 1887 has for its broad purpose to award compensation to ejected and outgoing tenants for improvements on the demised property effected by them, the future benefit of which enures to the landlord. Section 3 defines improvements and enacts that certain specified words should be presumed to be improvements until the contrary is shown. Among such "improvements" are the following: (h) the planting, protection or maintenance of fruit trees, timber trees and other useful trees and plants: (i) the protection or maintenance of such trees, the same having grown spontaneously during the tenancy. Section 6 enacts in general terms that the compensation to be awarded is the amount by which the value, or the produce of the holding or the value of that produce is increased by the improvement; and certain guides are given to enable the Court to arrive at that value. Section 7 enacts in effect that any stipulation in a contract between landlord and tenant made after the 1st January 1856 shall be void so far as it contravenes the provisions of the Act. This Act was repealed by the Consolidating Act of 1900; but it has to be remembered that it was the Act in force at the time when the kychit of 1895 was executed. The Act of 1900 is a more ambitious and elaborate enactment than its predecessor: but it can hardly be said to be an advance upon it as regards felicity of expression or clearness of drafting. Section 4 takes the place of section 3 of the old Act; sub-section (h) practically exactly corresponds to (h) of the old Act; but sub-section (i) of the old Act is gone. By section 5 (1) every tenant shall on ejectment be entitled to compensation for improvements which have been made by him or his predecessor-in-title. By section 6 (1) where a claim is established for compensation under section 5, the Court is to determine the amount of compensation by the method provided in sections 9 to 18. For the purposes of this case, it is necessary to examine the provisions of those sections, and I may shortly summarise them as follows: For improvements other than those relating to trees the compensation is arrived at by a calculation based on the present value of the improvement together with the cost of its execution. Where the improvement consists of trees spontaneously grown during the period of the tenancy or planted by the tenant or his predecessors, the compensation is to be three-fourths of the value which the timber would fetch if cut and sold in the open market (section 10). Where the improvement consists of trees not planted by the tenant or his predecessor or of trees spontaneously grown before the commencement of his tenancy, the compensation is to be calculated on a lower basis designed to arrive at the amount due to the tenant for his labour for their protection and maintenance. Mr. Rosario's able argument is as follows. The policy of the Act of 1900 is to give to the tenant compensation on a large scale for those improvements which but for the Act he would up to the time of ejectment be entitled to treat as his own property and remove, and to give him compensation on a less generous scale for "improvements" which can only be regarded in the light of maintenance and care of the landlord's property. The Act for the first time brings within the category of improvements for which the more generous rate is awarded trees of spontaneous growth, and, therefore, he says, must be regarded as having intended for the first time to declare such trees to be the property of the tenant, the necessary corollary being that without the Act they would be and before the Act were the property of the landlord. At the time when the kychit of 1895 was executed, the Act of 1900 was not in force and, therefore, there was nothing to prevent the parties from making what agreement they pleased with regard to the treatment of the timber. Accordingly there was nothing illegal or invalid in the clause of the kychit which provided that the teak and other trees which had grown spontaneously and were yet to grow belonged to the landlord and could be cut and removed by him. In so far as the ownership of the trees is concerned there is nothing retrospective in the Act, for although section 19 is retrospective in so far as the right of the tenant to make improvements and to claim compensation for them is concerned, it does not otherwise purport to have a retrospective effect and, therefore, can have no effect upon his claim for damages for trees cut down during the tenancy, though it is conceded that it will have retrospective effect on the tenant's claim for compensation for trees left on the land, at any rate from the coming into force of the kychit of 1895, since section 19 is retrospective in the case of all instruments later than the 1st of January 1886. Mr. Rosario's position then, as I understand it, may be summarised as follows: Before the passing of the Act of 1900 all spontaneously grown trees accrued to the landlord, the owner of the soil. By the Act of 1900 the ownership in trees of spontaneous growth was transferred from the landlord to the tenant; but in so far as that transfer of ownership was effected, it only operated in the case of trees which first came into being after the passing of the Act. On this footing the landlord will be entitled to damages in respect of all spontaneous timber cut and removed by the tenant whose growth was earlier than 1900. With regard to the tenant's claim for compensation, the policy of the Act is to give him generous compensation only for what is to be regarded as his own property and the Act not, as has been pointed out, being retrospective in this respect, the parties are bound by the kychit of 1895 which at the time it was made was a perfectly legal stipulation, and the tenant can only recover what I may call the full compensation for trees of a growth subsequent to the passing of the Act. For those of earlier growth he will be relegated to the lower scale of compensation provided for in sections 11 and 13.

Mr. Rosario very candidly admitted that it was vital to this argument to follow him in his first contention that the Act effected a change of ownership in the case of trees of spontaneous growth from the landlord to the tenant. I am unable to accept that contention and do not think that the Act deals or was intended to deal with questions of ownership at all but is confined to the question of compensation. I may add that I do not think that the amount of compensation awarded by section 10 of the Act in the case of spontaneously grown trees, namely three-fourths of their value, throws any light on the question whether or no the Act intended to effect a change of ownership. I do not think it is necessary in an Act so loosely drafted as this to follow Mr. Menon's minute deductions from the language of sections 5 and 6 and say that the Act enacts that a tenant who passively allows trees to take root and grow on the land is "making improvements" within the meaning of the Act. I think it is sufficient to say that the Act in enumerating certain things for which the tenant should be given compensation, the great majority of which can be properly described as improvements made by him, includes in the list spontaneously grown trees which can hardly be properly described as "improvements" and certainly cannot be said to be made by him or anybody else. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Act awards compensation to the tenant in respect of all spontaneously grown timber left on the holding on ejection which came into existence either during the term of the tenant or that of his predecessor, provided that no compensation has already been paid for it. It is conceded that on this construction in the present case the tenant will be entitled to compensation on what I may call the larger scale in respect of all trees which came into existence in 1873 or any subsequent year.

With regard to the landlord's claim for damages for trees cut and removed by the tenant the position is this. If the trees in question were the property of the tenant, he is obviously entitled to do what he likes with them. I have already held that the Act of 1900 does nothing to alter the position with regard to this or vest a new ownership in the tenant. Then it is said that whatever may have been the position at common law, the provision in the Kyshit of 1895 clearly vests the ownership in the landlord. It, therefore, becomes necessary to examine that clause in the contract and see whether it is obnoxious to the provisions of section 19. It is clear that under the Act the tenant would be entitled to claim compensation for all spontaneously grown trees which he left standing at the end of his tenancy. It follows that a contract which allows the landlord to come on the land and cut and remove such trees must necessarily limit the right of the tenant to claim compensation for such improvements. I, therefore, hold that the provision in the Kyshit that the landlord may cut and remove these trees is contrary to the Act and bad. It is argued that the early words which purport to give the property in the trees to the landlord, are separable and do not contravene any provision of the Act. Treating them as separable I do not think they help the appellant, because, in my opinion, they do not form an operative portion of the clause but are merely declaratory of the supposed rights of the parties. Some Judges of this Court have expressed the opinion that trees of spontaneous growth become the property of the tenant at common law apart from any question of the effect of the Statute. See Krishnacharya v. Anthakki (1). I do not, however, clearly follow the reasoning by which this conclusion is attained and should be inclined myself to the view that that which came to grow on the land naturally became the property of the ultimate owner of that land; but I do not think it is necessary to decide that question for the purposes of this case. During the tenancy the tenant is entitled to cut down trees in the ordinary course of prudent forestry, though they may belong to the landlord. His only obligation is to return the property in substantially the same condition as he took it and to abstain from any act of the nature of waste. No allegation is made in this case that there has been any substantial diminution in the value of the property during the term by reason of the cutting of these trees, nor is there any allegation of any act in the nature of waste. In these circumstances I think the landlord's claim for damages fails.

The last point taken in appeal relates to the price which the learned Subordinate Judge has fixed for the paddy. The Fort St. George Gazette of the 11th March 1913 fixes 21.23 as the number of imperial seers per rupee and proceeds to set out the equivalent for that in the Walluvanad Taluk as 17.40 Macleod's seers. The learned Judge apparently holds that Macleod's seers in the notification is a mistake for edangalis, for the reason that the local measures in use in the taluk are not Macleod's seers but edangalis or narayams. This appears to me to be quite arbitrary and unwarrantable, and the Judge's finding in this respect must be reversed and the case sent back for a fresh finding on this issue. Six weeks for finding and seven days for objections.

We are also asked to direct an enquiry to be held as to which of the trees were anterior to 1873 and which were subsequent to that date. We asked Mr. Rosario at the last hearing and he said that all that he could suggest was there might be two trees which went back to that date. I am extremely doubtful if even these could be identified with certainty and even if they could be, we think the expenses of having a finding on the point will be far in excess of any possible advantage that might result to either party from it. We do not, therefore, think it necessary to call for a finding on this point.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree.

On the question of the identity of the properties mortgaged I agree with my learned brother that the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge is right. Mr. Rosario says that the Subordinate Judge has mainly relied upon the description of the northern boundary and has from that inferred that the property which is described as the northern boundary of item No. 1 included certain plots in dispute. He argues that applying the test of the Subordinate Judge the western boundary should have been differently described. It may be, as argued by the learned Vakil, that the test applied by the Subordinate Judge is not a conclusive one; but it has to be remembered that he has considered the position of the plots with reference to the survey plan. The District Munsif made no reference at all to the survey plan. In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that the Subordinate Judge is wrong.

(1) 31 Ind. Cas. 12; 29 M. L. J. 314; 18 M. L. T. 218; (1915) M. W. N. 726.

The main contention is, that trees of spontaneous growth which came into existence before Madras Act I of 1900 was passed are the property of the jenmi, and that the declaration of the defendant in Exhibit A admitting the right of the jenmi is binding on him. The first mortgage was granted by the predecessor in title of the plaintiff to the defendant in 1873. It was renewed in 1887 by Exhibit VII and finally by Exhibit A in 1895. On the question of the right of the trees no judicial pronouncements have been quoted to us on either side. Mr. Rosario relied upon certain observations in Narayana v. Narayana (2) as indicating that the trees under the Customary Law of Malabar belong to the landlord. I do not think that this suggestion is borne out by the judgment. What the learned Judges say is that they were not aware of any law which recognised in the kanomdar the right to compensation on account of trees of spontaneous growth. As I understand the judgment, it only lays down that prior to the passing of the Act of 1887 and the Act of 1900 it was not competent to the tenant to compel the landlord to purchase him out with reference to trees of spontaneous growth. The contention of Mr. Menon on the other hand that the trees belong to the tenant is not sustained by the authorities quoted by him. No doubt in Krishnacharya v. Anthakki (1), a case from South Canara, the learned Judges inclined to the view that trees of spontaneous growth belong to the tenant in possession; but they say "the appellant" (the landlord) "has not adduced any evidence of custom or usage by which he is entitled to such spontaneous growths." I do not think that that decision is clear authority for the position that tenants are owners of trees of this description in Malabar. On the other hand, the decision in Vasudevan Nambudripad v. Valia Chathu Achan (3), which seems to concede that the landlord can restrain the tenant from removing certain trees during the continuance of the tenancy, may by implication be said to lay down that the landlord is the owner of the trees. I do not consider that Vasudevan Nambudripad v. Valia Chathu Achan (3) decides the right of the landlord any more than I consider that Krishnacharya v. Anthakki (1) gives the right to the tenant. In the first edition of his work Mr. Wigram, who had considerable experience of Malabar, says that "it is the practice of Courts to hold that in a kuzhikkanom or ordinary kanom or any superior tenure there is an implied covenant to compensate for all unexhausted improvements." This would seem to imply that it was open to the tenant to have exhausted the improvements during the continuance of the tenancy. In this state of the authorities I feel great difficulty in giving a decision regarding the respective rights as to the ownership of the landlord and the tenant in trees of spontaneous growth. In this case it does not seem necessary to give a definite opinion on the question, as I think that the second appeal can be disposed of upon other grounds.

I do not think that the two Acts, Act I of 1887 and Act I of 1900, should be construed as in any way declaring or defining the rights of the landlord and the tenant to trees of spontaneous growth. They were intended to fix the amount payable to the outgoing tenant or mortgagee, as the case may be, in respect of the improvements existing at the time of the eviction or redemption. The principle adopted in the Acts is to compensate the tenant for the labour expended by him on the land, irrespective of the question whether he had acquired a proprietary right to the trees or not. This is rendered clear by a reference to section 3, clauses (h) and (i), of the Act of 1887. Clause (h) refers to the trees which have been planted and includes in the amount of compensation to be awarded the cost of planting them. Clause (i) which deals with trees of spontaneous growth restricts the right of compensation to the cost of protection or maintenance. From these two clauses the conclusion is irresistible that in the case of trees planted by the tenant as well as in the case of trees of which he is only the care-taker, the compensation has reference not to the proprietorship in them but to the labour spent by the tenant in either rearing or protecting them. The Act of 1900 by section 13 carries out this principle a step further by fixing a different scale of fees in respect of trees which have grown spontaneously, from the scale applicable to trees planted by the tenant himself. Therefore in applying the two Acts it is not necessary to decide the question whether the trees belong to the landlord or the tenant. It is well settled that in awarding the compensation we have to be guided by the Act which is in force at the time of the decree. See Koshikot Pudiya Kovil g th v. Chundayil Madattul Ananta Pattar (4). Therefore the only question that need be considered in this second appeal is the quantum of compensation payable, and not the proprietorship in the trees. Mr. Rosario raised the point that, as the contract of mortgage on which the suit is brought was entered in 1895, the tenant is only entitled to compensation as regards trees which were either planted by him after the contract or which came into existence after 1895. Prior to the passing of the two Acts there was some little doubt as to whether a tenant who obtains a kanom can claim to stand in the shoes of those whom he had succeeded. Mr. Holloway was of opinion that "reason, convenience and the principle of the law all point to the date of renewal as that from which improvements to be paid for are determined or calculated." This dictum apparently did not find favour with the learned Judges of this Court in Mupanagari Narayanan Nayar v. Virupatchan Nambudripad (5). They point out that no invariable rule can be deduced on this point, but that the question must be decided on the evidence as to custom adduced in each case. When the Act of 1900 was passed, section 5 provided that every tenant shall be entitled to compensation for improvements which have been made by him, his predecessor-in-interest or by any person not in occupation at the time of the ejectment who derived title from either of them. It follows from this that a tenant who has obtained a renewal is entitled to claim compensation for improvements made during his first tenancy; for if a tenant is entitled to compensation for improvements made by his predecessor, a fortiori he is entitled to compensation for improvements made by himself during his first tenancy. Therefore, in any opinion, the defendant is entitled to compensation for all improvements which came into existence since the commencement of his first tenancy in 1873. See also Thekkemannengath Raman v. Kakkeseri Pazhiyot Manakkal (6) per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.

(4) 6 Ind. Cas. 887; 34 M. 61; (1910) M. W. N. 402; 8 M. L. T. 218; 20 M. L. J. 849.

The further contention raised by the learned Vakil is that the clause in Exhibit A, which says that the trees which have grown spontaneously and which are yet to grow "belong to you and they can be cut and removed for your purposes," does not offend against the provisions of either Act I of 1887 or of Act I of 1900 and that it is binding on the defendant. The argument is that this clause does not either take away or limit the right of the tenant to make improvements; it was conceded that if the clause operated in that direction it cannot be binding upon the defendant. I am unable to agree that the effect of this clause is not to restrict the tenant in his right to make improvements. The clause implies that the landlord can enter upon the land and cut and carry away the trees. It would impede the operations of the tenant in making improvements if the landlord is permitted to enter on the land, whenever he chooses to cut and carry away the trees. Further it undoubtedly debars the tenant from claiming compensation, because if the landlord cuts and carries away the trees, nothing will be left outstanding at the time of eviction, and the tenant would be disentitled to compensation if they are not there. I, therefore, think that the clause in Exhibit A is opposed to section 19 of the Act of 1900 and section 7 of the Act 1887.

(6) 27 Ind. Cas. 989; 28 M. L. J. 184; 2 L. W. 433.

NARAYANI AMMA v. KUNCHUKUTTI AMMA.

One other contention of the learned Vakil may be dealt with in this connection before dealing with the value of paddy. Mr. Rosario contended that he ought to be given damages for the trees of spontaneous growth which the tenant had unlawfully cut and carried away during the tenancy. This proposition implies that the landlord was the owner of the trees. With reference to this contention, it may become necessary to decide the question whether the landlord or the tenant is the proprietor of the trees, if the clause which declares the right of the landlord to the trees is not opposed to section 7 of Act I of 1887 and section 19 of Act I of 1900. I have already stated that the condition as to cutting and carrying away the trees is obnoxious to both the sections. It is impossible to separate the clause as to ownership from the clause which entitles the landlord to enter upon the premises to cut and carry away the trees. The contract as to an essential portion being unenforceable, it is void in its entirety. See section 24 of the Contract Act. As the right to damages was rested upon this admission of the landlord's right by the tenant in the contract of 1895, and as I hold that this contract is not binding on the defendant, it is unnecessary here again to consider the broader question raised by Mr. Rosario regarding the ownership in the trees.

On the third question raised by Mr. Rosario as to the value of the paddy it seems to me that the Subordinate Judge's judgment is unsatisfactory. There are a number of surmises in paragraph 20 for which we have not been referred to any evidence in the case. The Commissioner has given a valuation which the Subordinate Judge says he is unable to accept. In that case he was bound to have looked into the evidence and to have arrived at a finding on it instead of indulging in speculations as to whether the Government Notification rightly fixes the proportion between the imperial seer and Macleod's seer. The Subordinate Judge's conclusion upon this point cannot be sustained and he must be asked to return a fresh finding regarding the price of paddy.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Palghat submitted the following

FINDING.—I am asked to submit a revised finding on the following issue:—

1. What is the rate at which price of paddy must be calculated?

2. The evidence on this point consists of the testimony of plaintiffs' witness No. 1 on the one side, and defence witness No. 1 on the other side. Plaintiffs' witness No. 1 says that paddy sells at 9 narayams per rupee, and at Rs. 36 per 60 paras, and that the price was nearly the same for the last ten years. 9 narayams per rupee will be $11\frac{1}{4}$ edangalis per rupee. Rs. 36 per 60 paras will be $20\frac{5}{6}$ edangalis per rupee. Thus there is considerable difference between the two amounts. It is not possible to say what was the price on an average. In the plaint he has claimed at the rate of $13\frac{3}{4}$ edangalis per rupee.

3. On the side of defendants there is the affidavit of defendants objecting to the Commissioner's valuation and it says that the price must be calculated at the rate of 16 edangalis per rupee. The same man is examined as plaintiffs' witness No. 1 and he says that for the last ten years the price of paddy is between 13 and 15 narayams per rupee. If it is 13 narayams it will be $16\frac{1}{4}$ edangalis, If it is 15 narayams it will be $18\frac{3}{4}$ edangalis. As he says that the price is between 13 and 15 narayams we may take 14 as the average. If that be so, the price will be $17\frac{1}{2}$ edangalis per rupee. I am inclined to believe this witness.

4. I find that the price must be calculated at the rate of $17\frac{1}{2}$ edangalis per rupee.

The second appeal coming on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Appellate Court upon the issue referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding. The second appeal is dismissed with costs. Time for redemption will be four months from this date.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. II, r. 2, s. 11—Suit to recover share of inheritance—Suit, subsequent, to recover share of gifted property, whether barred—Res judicata—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 42—Suit for declaration of share in decree, maintainability of.

One B. M. in his lifetime divided his moveable property among his four sons, S., K., B. and A., and directed that a sum of Rs. 3,000 odd due to him from one B. L. should be held jointly by all four of them. On his death S. sued the representatives of B. L. and got a decree for the whole sum as due to himself. K. then brought a suit to recover his share in the moveable and immoveable properties left by B. M. His suit was decreed in respect of the immoveable property but was dismissed as regards the moveable property, inasmuch as it was held that B. M. had divided all his moveable property among his sons in his lifetime. K. then sued for a declaration of his one-fourth share in the decree obtained by S. against B. L.'s representatives:

Held, (1) that the suit for a declaration was competent; [p. 256, col. 1.]

(2) that inasmuch as the previous suit related to a share in the property left by B. M. it was not incumbent on K. to include in it a claim for a share in the property held by S. in which K. had an interest, and that, therefore, the suit was not barred either by Order II, rule 2 or by section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code [p. 257, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—The following pedigree-table will show the relationship between the parties:—

The facts of this case are briefly as follows:—

Bhana Mal in his lifetime divided up a certain portion of his property among his four sons and separated from them. Each son was also separated from his brothers and held his own share individually. This separation took place in 1903 and was evidenced by four chaupatras in which the detail of the shares allotted to each of the brother was duly entered. These chaupatras are dated the 21st February 1903 and have been admitted as correct by the parties.

There was a sum of Rs. 3,000 odd due to Bhana Mal by one Brij Lal and with regard to this in the chaupatras it is distinctly entered that the debt due by Brij Lal, amounting to Rs. 3,000, is to be held jointly by the four brothers each having a quarter share amounting to Rs. 775.

On the 24th March 1905 Brij Lal struck a balance in favour of Bhana Mal acknowledging, a sum of Rs. 3,031 as due. Bhana Mal died in December 1905.

Sri Ram is the elder brother and on the 15th September 1907 Brij Lal struck a balance, Rs. 3,780, as due by him but in favour of Sri Ram alone.

On the 19th November 1910 Sri Ram sued the sons of Brij Lal, who had then died, for the money due on this balance and impleaded his own brothers as defendants. In that suit Sri Ram alleged that he had spent about Rs. 1,400 on the funeral ceremonies of his father and that he and his brothers had come to an arrangement by which the money due by Brij Lal was to be taken over by him in lieu of the Rs. 1,400 so spent and that he had paid their share of the balance to each of his brothers. Badri Das admitted this claim on his own behalf as well as on behalf of his nephew Walaiti Ram, whose father was dead. In this suit on the 14th December 1910 Kanshi Ram flatly denied the alleged settlement and claimed to be entitled to a share in the whole of the money due by Brij Lal. He was directed to bring a regular suit and Sri Ram obtained a decree in his favour on the 23rd December 1910.

Kanshi Ram then on the 17th July 1911 brought a suit against his brothers in which he claimed one-fourth share in all that had been left by Bhana Mal. He detailed the immoveable property and fixed the value of the moveable property including the outstandings, at Rs. 11,000 approximately, alleging that if it was found on taking account that the moveable property exceeded this sum he was prepared to pay the necessary Court-fee on the excess. This suit resulted in a decree in favour of Kanshi Ram qua the immoveable property but his claim to the moveable property was dismissed. Sri Ram, who defended that suit, pleaded that Bhana Mal had left no moveable estate inasmuch as all moneys due to him had been divided up in his lifetime between his four sons, but admitted that Kanshi Ram was entitled to a fourth share in the immoveable property.

On the 27th February 1912 Kanshi Ram brought the present suit against his brothers and nephew, praying for a declaration to the effect that he was entitled to a fourth share in the sum decreed in favour of Sri Ram on the 23rd December 1910 and his suit has been decreed. Against this decree Sri Ram has filed his present appeal through Mr. Nanak Chand and Mr. Tek Chand has appeared on behalf of Kanshi Ram. Mr. Nanak Chand has raised various legal points. Firstly, he alleged that no declaratory suit lay. He did not, however, press this and as Sri Ram has not as yet executed the decree it seems to me that there is no legal bar to the suit as brought.

Secondly, it was urged that the present suit was barred by section 11 and Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code. It was urged that the plaintiff had in 1911 sued for a quarter share in the whole of the property left by Bhana Mal, that as his claim for a quarter share in the moveable property had been dismissed no suit, therefore, lay. With regard to Order II, rule 2, it was contended that as the sum now in suit ought to have been included in the suit in 1911, the present suit is not competent, and I have been referred to Mahi v. Usman (1), Nawab Muhammad Kabir Khan v. Musammat Bhag Bhari (2) and Dampanaboyina Gangi v. Addala Ramaswami (3). On the merits it was urged that Badri Das's evidence, the only evidence produced by Sri Ram, should be accepted. Mr. Tek Chand on the other hand has pointed out that Kanshi Ram's position has been throughout that this money now in suit was not left by Bhana Mal and did not form a part of his estate at the time of his death, but that it had been made over by Bhana Mal in his lifetime to the four brothers jointly, and that, therefore, neither section 11 nor Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, was a bar to the case. He referred me to the written statements of Badri Das and Sri Ram (in the former case), in which the fact that Bhana Mal had divided up all the moveable property between the four brothers was clearly and unmistakably pleaded. In fact Badri Das clearly pleaded that in this case, and in his statement alleged that on the death of Bhana Mal the brothers had agreed to make over the debt of Brij Lal to Sri Ram in lieu of Rs. 1,400 expended by him, and that Sri Ram had paid each of them Rs. 400 as a share of the balance. There is no proof of this other than the statement of Badri Das, which is, of course, contradicted by Kanshi Ram's statement, and it seems to me that the learned District Judge (old style) was right in thinking that had the arrangement alleged been really arrived at with regard to this particular debt due by Brij Lal there would have been some writing to evidence the fact, if it was only a receipt executed by the brothers for Rs. 400 that each of them are alleged to have been paid by Sri Ram. Sri Ram himself, as I have pointed out above, clearly pleaded in the suit in 1911 that his father had distributed the whole of his outstandings amongst his sons. In these circumstances I have no hesitation in holding that this debt did not form part of Bhana Mal's estate when he died. With regard to the legal aspect I have consulted the authorities cited by Mr. Nanak Chand as well as Dalipa v. Suraj Kaur (4), Har Dyal v. Aya Ram (5), Muhammad Ali v. Mir Haidar (6), Sumcka Dasi v. Baikuntha Chandra Das (7), Musammat Badshah v. Sahib (8) and Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (9) referred to by Mr. Tek Chand. It seems to me that the last case of Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (9), which is a Privy Council ruling, is very much to the point. My own view is that inasmuch as the suit in 1911 related to a share in the property left by Bhana Mal, it was not incumbent on Kanshi Ram to include in it the claim for a share in the property held by Sri Ram in which Kanshi Ram had an interest. He certainly did not make any claim with regard to this sum of money so that section 11 clearly does not apply and as he was not bound to include the present claim in that suit, Order II, rule 2, is no bar.

In these circumstances I hold that the decree passed by the learned District Judge (old style) is correct and I confirm it and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 170 (3), 161—Transferee of portion of occupancy holding not transferable by custom, whether entitled to make deposit—Interest of transferee—Interest and encumbrance, difference between.

Per Curiam (Mullick, J., dissenting).—The transferee of a portion of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom is not a person who has in the holding proclaimed for sale an interest which is "voidable on the sale" within the meaning of section 170(3), Bengal Tenancy Act, and is not, therefore, entitled to deposit the amount of the landlord's decree and costs under that section. [p. 262, col. 1; p. 263, col. 2.]

The interest of such a transferee is not an encumbrance as defined in section 161 of the Act. [p. 262, col. 1; p. 263, col. 2.]

Mahanti Lal Sahu v. Harkissen Jha, 19 C. W. N. clxxvi (176) followed.

Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh, 18 C. W. N. ccxix (219), not followed.

Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman, 31 Ind. Cas. 554; 22 C. L. J. 356; 19 C. W. N. 1217, 43 C. 558, relied upon.

Per Mullick, J.—The purchaser of a portion of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom has an interest voidable on the sale, and is entitled to deposit the arrears under section 170 (3), Bengal Tenancy Act. The interest of such a person is not an encumbrance within the meaning of section 161, Bengal Tenancy Act. The word "interest" in section 170 is a wider term than encumbrance and includes rights other than those falling within the narrow limits of section 161, Bengal Tenancy Act. [p. 264, col. 1; p. 265, col. 1; p. 267, col. 1.]

Rameshwar Singh v. Raghunandan Khawas, 38 Ind. Cas. 337; 1 P. L. J. 403, doubted.

Case-law discussed and reviewed.

Civil revision against an order of the Munsif, Sitamarhi, dated the 7th September 1916.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Mr. Lakshmi Narayan Singh (with him Mr. Nirsu Narayan Singh), for the Petitioner.—The question is whether a purchaser of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding can make a deposit under section 170 (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, to save the holding from sale in execution of a decree for rent against the registered tenant.

I would refer first to the ruling of this High Court in Rameshwar Singh v. Raghunandan Khawas (1), in which the purchaser of an entire non-transferable occupancy holding was held not so entitled. If the holding is not transferable by custom, and if the whole has been transferred, the tenant has walked out and the transferee has no interest in the eye of law and so he cannot make a deposit. If the holding is transferable, the landlord being bound by the transfer, cannot sue the original tenant; and the suit itself being incompetent, the decree is wrong, and the transferee being not affected by the decree and sale, he cannot make a deposit. Thus, in either case, the purchaser of an entire holding cannot make a deposit.

But the question of the purchaser of a portion only stands altogether on a different footing. Refers to the Full Bench case of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy Chowdhuri (2).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—(After consulting the other Judges). We propose to accept this Full Bench decision. I believe both the sides accept it.]

Refers to order of reference at page 174* which speaks about the interest of such a purchaser.

MAHADEO LAL v. LANGAT SINGH.

The Full Bench has held that the purchaser of a portion has an interest in the holding, and the logical corollary from that is that he should be given a right to protect that interest. The phrase in section 170, clause (3), "any person having an interest voidable on the sale" should be construed liberally. If the interest is not 'voidable' but 'void', he has greater right to prevent the sale.

[CHAPMAN, J.—His interest is avoided by the sale, but I would like to know if the term 'voidable' has been used in that sense.]

[MULLICK, J.—The meaning of that word has been explained in Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3).]

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Is it not a fact that all the Judges who have touched the point have held the word 'voidable' to refer to 'incumbrances' under section 161.]

Yes, except Justice Mookerjee. I am, however, greatly hampered by the judgment of your Lordship, the Chief Justice, in Rameshwar Singh v. Raghunandan Khawas (1).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Do not be hampered, you are arguing before Full Court.]

Encumbrances are (1) notified and registered incumbrances; (2) ordinary ones. The purchaser's interest is voidable on the sale, as the execution purchaser has to take some steps before dispossessing him, that is, he has to avoid the purchase.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Has he to apply to the Collector under section 167 ?]

No. But he must go to the Civil Court.

[MULLICK, J.—Then by your argument the purchaser of an entire holding will also be said to have an interest 'voidable' on the sale.]

The Full Bench in Dayamoyi's case (2), has, however, held that the purchaser of a portion only in a non-transferable holding has an interest, while that of the whole has no interest at all.

[CHAPMAN, J.—Your argument is that even if it is not an 'incumbrance' and the landlord need not apply to the Collector, your client's interest is 'voidable' on the sale because it will be avoided by the sale.]

Yes.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—You seem to be putting the cart before the horse. See section 170

(3) 16 Ind. Cas. 977; 17 C. W. N. 163; 16 C. L. J. 548.

and look to section 174 which is very limited as compared with Order XXI, rule 89, Civil Procedure Code. The purchaser of a portion, according to your argument, easily comes under Order XXI, rule 89. Would your client by paying the money under section 170, claim under section 171, a mortgage for money so paid?]

No. I will not be a mortgagee. I pay money before sale and can only bring a suit for contribution against the original tenant.

[SHARFUDDIN, J.—Section 171 is clear.] I have not come across any case on the point.

[MULLICK, J.—Why do you say, you cannot be a mortgagee in respect of the whole holding?]

[CHAMIER, C. J.—It is quite clear that if we hold that he has an interest 'voidable' on the sale under section 170, he becomes a mortgagee under section 171.]

I now draw your Lordships' attention to Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—That case is peculiar and distinguishable, as the transferee had remained in possession for 12 years to the knowledge of the landlord.]

But the Judges were not influenced by that circumstance, as appears from the observations at page 165 of the report, left hand column. The word used in section 170 is 'interest' and not 'incumbrance'.

[CHAPMAN, J.—What is the strongest and the best case on your side?]

The case exactly in point is Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4). But it is not for us to say what is the best case—your Lordships can better say that. Mr. Justice D. Chatterjee decided the case of Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh (5). I also rely upon Radhika Nath Sarkar v. Rakhal Raj Gayen (6).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—This is contrary to Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7). The authorities are on both sides. Let us discuss the various words used in the section.]

I may refer to Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7), Jugal Mohini Dasi v. Sri Nath Chatterjee (8). I strongly rely upon the dissentient judgment of Mr. Justice Mullick in the former at page 565*. My argument is of a threefold character; (1) that the interest of the purchaser of a portion is voidable on the sale, (2) even if it be held to be void, he has greater right to protect the sale, and (3) he is an encumbrancer under section 161, his purchase being in limitation of the original tenant's interest in the portion sold. Section 170 has not to be read with section 161, as it does not speak of any encumbrance voidable on the sale, but any interest voidable on the sale.

[ATKINSON, J.—It speaks of 'voidable' on the sale.]

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Chapter XIV has to be read as a whole. It provides for annulling interest defined in the chapter as encumbrances. The purchaser's interest is not a protected interest, under section 160, section 310A old Civil Procedure Code (Order XXI, rule 89) does not apply now to Bengal Tenancy Act, section 174 of which bears a striking difference in language.]

Yes, it has been held that no one but the judgment-debtor can deposit it after the sale, but before the sale, one can make a deposit and section 170 provides for that. Clause (2) says, 'paid into Court' but not 'by whom'.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—But the succeeding clause says, who can pay the money.]

The ruling in Tamizuddin Khan v. Khoda Nawaz Khan (9), is against me. But it has been doubted and discussed in Asgar Ali v. Gouri Mohan Roy (10), also in Mr. Justice Mullick's judgment in Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—You can get a number of cases on either side.]

On the merits, I submit that the tenants in this Province generally sell a portion of their holdings; and your Lordships' decision, if against me, will be disastrous to the entire tenantry of Bihar, who, then, will not be able to raise money on marriage occasions or to pay up arrears of rent. But I confess, as a landlord, I shall have personally reason to rejoice.

Mr. Baidyanath Narayan Sinha, for the Opposite Party.—Chapter XIV of the Bengal Tenancy Act is a self-contained chapter and the sections of any other Act should not be read into it. Section 170, clause (3), speaks of 'interest voidable on the sale.' It is opposed to a 'void' interest. We have next to see what is meant by 'voidable'. I submit it refers to those interests which have to be avoided or annulled by the landlord under Chapter XIV, sections 159. It speaks of two kinds of interest, 'protected interests' and other 'interests', which, for the sake of convenience, have been included under a catch-word 'encumbrance'. It is thus immaterial that the word 'encumbrance' has not been used in section 170 (3), as I submit Chapter XIV does not contemplate a third kind of interest, all interests coming under, (1) 'protected ones', or (2) 'encumbrance,' which, has been used as synonymous with 'interest;' the word 'avoided' also is same as 'annulled'. Section 159 speaks clearly of 'interests.'

[MULLICK, J.—Has the purchaser of a portion no 'interest'?)

He has an 'interest' under the Full Bench decision of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy Chowdhuri (2), but his interest does not come under the stringent provisions of Chapter XIV, which provides for a special procedure relating to sales in execution of rent decrees.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—The phrase is 'voidable on the sale' and not 'avoided by the sale'.]

I may refer to section 159 and proviso (b).

[CHAMIER, C. J.—The whole question is, whether the words 'interest voidable on the sale' refer back to section 159. Section 166 also speaks of 'with power to avoid', and in the very next sub-section, the word 'annul' is used. They may be convertible terms.]

I may refer to Jotindra Mohan Tagore v. Durga Dabe (11); further, a co-tenant's interest has been held to be 'void' and not 'voidable' as his interest passes along with the sale. 'On the sale' means 'after the sale'.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Has the Full Bench decision given the purchaser of a portion any right other than resisting ejectment by the landlord as long as the original tenant retains the other portion?]

I submit he has not been given any right other than that, and of applying under (11) 10 C. W. N. 438.

MAHADEO LAL J. LANGAT SINGH.

Order XXI, rule 90, to set aside a fraudulent sale, as a representative of the judgment-debtor under section 47, Civil Procedure Code.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—He is only a shadow of the original tenant.]

[MULLICK, J.—What about interests other than 'encumbrances'? How are they to be avoided?]

Bengal Tenancy Act does not say anything about that.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—The purchaser of a transferable holding is an encumbrancer.]

Yes, but not that of non-transferable holding.

[CHAMPMAN, J.—As it has not to be 'avoided'.]

Yes, it passes along with the sale. Moreover, a sale is not an interest on the tenure or holding, nor is it in limitation of the tenant's right.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—Cannot an occupancy raiyat create a sub-lease?]

Yes, but not for more than nine years. See section 85.

[MULLICK, J.—Suppose, it exceeds nine years.]

[CHAMIER, C. J.—The under-tenant goes with the tenant.]

The ruling in Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh (5) proceeds upon assumptions and does not discuss the point. Nalini Behari Roy Fulmani Dasi (12) is in my favour, also Tamizuddin Khan v. Khoda Nawaz Khan (9).

[MULLICK, J.—It only holds that the purchaser of a portion is not an encumbrancer.]

Then I submit he cannot be entitled to come under section 170 (3).

[MULLICK, J.—You are begging the question.]

I may draw your Lordship's attention to the clear and explicit observations of Jenkins, C. J. in Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7), where it is said the purchaser of the entire holding or a portion stands on the same footing—both 'stand or fall together' (reads the passage).

The case of Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3) overlooks the fact that an 'encumbrance' is also an 'interest' under sections 159 and 161.

[MULLICK, J.—Justice Mookerji's decision has remained unshaken.]

The decision in Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7) does not expressly refer to it, but it dissents from it by implication, just as the Full Bench case of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy Chowdhuri (2) overrules the previous decisions without referring expressly to any one of them. Some case wrongly interpreted the Full Bench decision as giving the purchaser a right to make a deposit, and so the learned Chief Justice in Abdul Rahman v. Ahmadar Rahman (7) expounded its true effect and thus, in a way, by implication challenged the correctness of the rulings to the contrary.

I may refer to Ashutosh Ghose v. Abinash Chandra Chowdhuri (13), where a co-tenant's interest was held to pass along with the sale, being wholly 'void' and not 'voidable on the sale'. The purchaser of a portion cannot certainly claim a higher privilege and protection than a co-tenant. The ruling in Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4) is the same case as Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4) (notes portion).

The cases of Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh (5) and Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4) were decided by the same Bench on one and the same day.

The decision in Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3) is based upon other cases which are distinguishable, and it is, I submit, not logical, as an interest, which passes with the sale, cannot be held to be 'voidable', there being nothing to 'avoid'.

Mr. L. N. Singh, in reply.—Under the Full Bench decision, the purchaser of a portion can apply to set aside the sale under Order XXI, rule 90, on the ground of fraud and irregularity, and it would thus be absurd to contend that he cannot in time make a deposit and prevent the sale. When he can come after the sale and impeach it, he should surely be allowed to come and deposit before the sale.

[CHAMIER, C. J.—There seems to be no absurdity. If the landlord conducts the execution sale properly, why should he not buy up the property?]

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, C. J.—The question for decision is whether the applicant, the purchaser without landlord's consent of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding, which has been proclaimed for sale under section 163 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, is entitled to deposit the amount of the landlord's decree and costs under section 170, sub-section 3 of the Act. That section provides inter alia that when an order for the sale of a holding in execution of a rent-decree has been made the holding shall not be released from attachment, unless before it is knocked down to the auction-purchaser the amount of the decree and certain costs are paid into Court, and that the judgment-debtor or any person having in the holding any interest "voidable on the sale" may pay money into Court under that section.

The case has been referred to this Bench partly on account of the importance of the question involved and partly because there has been a difference of opinion on the question in the Calcutta High Court, D. Chatterji and Walmsley, JJ., having decided it in the affirmative in Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh (5) and Jenkins C. J. and N. R. Chatterjea, J., having decided it in the negative in Mahanti Lal Sahu v. Harkissen Jha (14). These two cases are so far as I am aware the only cases in which the precise question has been decided. Our attention has been drawn to a large number of cases which bear more or less upon the question but they cannot be said to establish any settled cursus curiæ on the subject which this Court ought to follow. Both sides have in this case admitted the correctness of the propositions laid down by the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy Chowdhuri (2) and it may be conceded that as held in that case a purchaser with the landlord's consent of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding has an interest in the holding sufficient to entitle him to apply after an execution sale, as a representative of the raiyyat, to have the sale of the holding set aside on the ground of fraud, but the question which we have to decide is whether such a person has an interest in the holding "voidable on the sale" within the meaning of section 170 of the Act.

Section 159 lays down that when a holding is sold in execution of a decree of arrears due in respect thereof the purchaser shall take subject to the interest defined in Chapter XIV as "protected interests" but with power to annul the interests defined in that Chapter as "incumbrances" provided that the power to annul shall be exercisable only in the manner directed by that Chapter.

Section 160 shows what are "protected interests." No one suggests that the applicant has a "protected interest."

Section 161 defines the term "incumbrance" used with reference to a tenancy as meaning any lien, sub-tenancy, easement or other right or interest created by the tenant on his tenure or holding or in limitation of his own interest therein, and not being a protected interest as defined in the last foregoing section.

Section 163 provides inter alia that in the case of an occupancy holding the proclamation of sale shall announce that the holding will be sold with power to annul all incumbrances.

Section 166 provides that when an occupancy holding has been advertised for sale under section 163 it shall be put to auction and sold with power to avoid all incumbrances and the purchaser at a sale under this section may in manner provided by the next following section and not otherwise annul any incumbrance on the holding.

Section 167 prescribes the procedure to be followed by a purchaser having power to annul encumbrances and desiring to annul the same.

It seems to me quite clear that the words "annul" and "avoid" as used in these sections are convertible terms, that the only interests which are "voidable on the sale" within the meaning of section 170 are those interests which can be avoided by means of an application under section 167 and that the only interests which can be avoided by means of such an application are the interests defined in section 161 as "incumbrances". The result, in my opinion, is that the answer to the question which we have to decide depends upon whether the applicant has an incumbency as defined in section 161. In my opinion he has not. He certainly has not either a "lien, sub-tenancy, or easement." Has he "any other right or interest created by the tenant on his holding or in limitation of his own interest therein?" These words refer presumably to some right or interest which is ejusdem generis with the opening words of the definition and not to some much larger right or interest of a different description. Upon the construction of this definition I accept what was said by Jenkins, C. J. and N. R. Chatterjea, J., in Abdul Rahman v. Ahamadar Rahman (7). That was the case of a tenure and not of a holding but the reasoning of the learned Judges applies as much to a holding as to a tenure.

A transferee without the landlord's consent of a plot of land forming part of a non transferable holding may be entitled to retain possession of that plot while the tenant also retains possession of some portion of his holding, but, if an execution sale of the holding takes place, the holding passes to the auction-purchaser and it seems to me that the previous transferee of a plot, forming part of that holding must give way to the auction-purchaser, in other words the interest of transferee of the plot, whatever it may be, is avoided by the sale and the holding passes to the auction-purchaser free from any claim on the part of the transferee.

Chapter XIV of the Bengal Tenancy Act appears to me to be self-contained so far as the present question is concerned and upon a construction of the various provisions contained in that Chapter, I am of opinion that the applicant is not a person who has in the holding now proclaimed for sale an interest which is "voidable on the sale" within the meaning of section 170. I would, therefore, dismiss this application with costs. Hearing fee three gold mohurs.

CHAPMAN, J.—I agree with the judgment delivered by the Chief Justice.

ATKINSON, J.—I concur with the judgment delivered by the Chief Justice.

SHARFUDDIN, J.—The question referred to this Special Bench is one of very great importance. It is of importance to the landlords, to the occupancy ryots and to the transferees of a part of the holding. This question produced many conflicting rulings and for that reason this Special Bench was constituted in order to give a definite answer to the question put to this Bench in the Letter of Reference. The question referred to this Bench is whether a purchaser of a portion of an occupancy holding, not transferable without the consent of the landlord, can make a deposit as directed by sub-section 3 of section 170 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The sub-section is to the following effect:—"The judgment-debtor or any person having in the tenure or holding any interest voidable on the sale, may pay money into Court under this section." On the first reading of this sub-section it would no doubt appear that the wordings are most comprehensive but when we refer to other provisions of the Chapter wherein section 170 takes its place it seems to me clear that the purchaser referred to ought not to be given a right to make the deposit.

In the present dispute both sides have admitted the correctness of the propositions laid down by the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mehan Roy Chowdhuri (2). In this reported case it was held that after the execution sale a purchaser without the landlord's consent of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding has an interest in that holding as a representative and has a right to apply for the setting aside of the sale on the ground of fraud but the question that we have to decide is as to whether such a person has an interest in the holding "voidable on the sale" within the meaning of section 170 of the Act.

Section 171 provides that when a person having in a tenure or holding advertised for sale under this Chapter (Chapter XIV) or in execution of a certificate for arrears of rent due in respect thereof signed under the Bengal Public Demands Recovery Act of 1913 an interest which would be voidable by the sale pays into Court the amount requisite to prevent the sale:—

(a) the amount so paid by him shall be deemed to be a debt at 12 per cent. per annum and secured by a mortgage of the tenure or holding to him;

(b) his mortgage shall take priority

of every other charge on the tenure or holding other than a charge for arrears of rent; and

(c) he shall be entitled to possession of the tenure or holding as mortgage of the tenant and to retain possession of it as such until the date, when interest due thereon has been discharged.

It is clear, therefore, that in accordance with the provision of section 171 of the Act, the purchaser of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding, if allowed to make the deposit, becomes a mortgagee of the tenant, and as such he cannot be ousted by the landlord or by the purchaser of the holding in execution sale and the result would, therefore, be that new purchaser would be thrust on the landlord which I think certainly cannot have been the intention of the Legislature. The Legislature in enacting the Bengal Tenancy Act had in its view the safe-guarding of the interests both of the landlords and the tenants and it seems to me from other provisions of the Act that the Legislature is against forcing a stranger on the landlord without his consent and it is on this account that it has been held that the landlord is not bound to recognise a transferee of a part of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom.

In the present case the purchaser is certainly not a judgment-debtor. The question is whether he is entitled to avail himself of the provision of section 170 of the Act. Sub-section 3 of this section clearly provides that if a person has an interest "voidable on the sale" he is entitled to make the deposit. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this, namely, whether a purchaser of a part of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom has an interest "voidable on the sale." In order to determine that question I think it is necessary to refer to some other sections of the Act. Section 159 of the Act refers to the general powers of a purchaser to avoid encumbrances. That section provides: "Where a tenure or holding is sold in execution of a decree for arrears due in respect thereof, the purchaser shall take subject to the interests defined in this Chapter as 'protected interest' but with power to annul the interests defined in this Chapter as 'encumbrances'." As to what an encumbrance is we must refer to section 161 of the Act and as to how an encumbrance is to be avoided we have to refer to section 167 of the Act. On a perusal of these sections it is clear that under the provision of section 159 a purchaser takes the tenure or holding free from encumbrances and encumbrance as defined in section 161 can be voided or annulled under section 167. It follows from the provisions of the sections quoted that the encumbrance holders whose interest are voidable on the sale are persons who are entitled to make the deposit. It is also to be determined whether he has any encumbrance within the meaning of the section 161 of the Act under which section an encumbrance means a lien, sub-tenancy, easement or other right or interest created by the tenant on his tenure or holding or in limitation of his own interest therein, and not being a protected interest as defined by section 160 of the Act. In order, therefore, to determine whether a purchaser of a portion of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom is entitled to make the deposit, it has to be found whether he has an encumbrance within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act and if he has not such an encumbrance he has no right to make the deposit. In accordance with the definition of an encumbrance it seems to me clear that the purchaser of a part of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom is not an encumbrance holder. That being the view that I take, I hold that in the present case the purchaser had no right to make the deposit and I would, therefore, dismiss this application with costs.

MULLICK, J.—I am of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to deposit the arrears under section 170 (3), Bengal Tenancy Act.

The matter turns upon the meaning of the words "interest voidable on the sale."

The learned Vakil for the opposite party contends that the words mean "incumbrance liable to annulment after the sale by the special procedure for annulment of incumbrances in Chapter XIV, Bengal Tenancy Act," and that no interest which does not fall within the definition of incumbrance given in section 161 can be saved by payment under section 170.

To this the petitioner's first re-joinder is that he is in fact an incumbrancer. Now although there may have at one time been some foundation for the contention that the purchaser of a part of a tenure or holding is an incumbrancer the question is, I take it, now settled by the decision of Jenkins, C. J., in Abdul Rahman v. Ahamadar Rahman (7), which went before him on a reference to which I was myself a party.

The petitioner's next contention is that even if he is not an incumbrancer the word interest in section 170 is a wider term than incumbrance and includes rights other than those falling within the narrow limits of section 161.

In my opinion this contention is well founded. Chapter XIV does not in terms say that interest and incumbrance are synonymous, then why should we strain language and give the word interest a meaning it does not ordinarily possess.

Again if we rely on decisions in the Calcutta Court I have been able to find only one in support of this interpretation, namely Behari Lal Pau v. Fakir Chandra Roy (15), decided by Dass, J., sitting alone.

On the other hand the weight of authority is wholly in favour of the view that the protection afforded by sections 170 and 173, Bengal Tenancy Act, is not limited to incumbrances.

In principle there is no difference in this connection between a tenure and a holding and I give below the cases which seems to me to support my view. In Anund Lal Mookerjee v. Kalika Pershad Misser (16) it was held that the unregistered transferee of an under-tenure could stop a sale by payment of the arrears under section 6, Act VIII (B. C.) 1865. That case was decided before the Tenancy Act of 1885 but it is useful as showing if the judgment of Dass, J., in 1908, is correct, then the law has materially altered the position of unregistered transferees by sale.

So in Jotindra Mohan Tagore v. Durga Dabe (11), on which case the learned Vakil for the opposite party himself relies the transferee of a whole tenure was allowed to deposit the arrears under section 170 on the ground that he had been allowed to do so on a previous occasion.

To the same effect is Jugal Mohini Dasi v. Sri Nath Chatterjee (8), where the purchase was in respect of a part of a tenure.

To like effect is Radhika Nath Sarkar v. Rakhal Raj Gayen (6), where Jenkins, C. J. and Mookerjee, J., held that the unregistered purchaser of a share in a darpatni was entitled to deposit under section 171, Bengal Tenancy Act.

Again in Brindarani Choudhrani v. Annoda Mohan Ray Choudry (17), a person who had purchased a tenure long before the decree was allowed to deposit, it being held that although he was not strictly bound by the decree he would be allowed to deposit because he had been so allowed before.

In regard to occupancy holdings the purchaser of the whole or part has been allowed to deposit under sections 170 and 173, Bengal Tenancy Act in the following among other cases:—

Asgar Ali v. Gouri Mohan Roy (10), Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4), Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldeep Singh (5), and Tarak Das v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3).

The last of these cases is particularly in point because there the learned Judges decided in clear terms that interest and incumbrance were not synonymous terms for the purposes of Chapter XIV.

The opposite party relies on Nalini Behary Roy v. Fulmani Dasi (12). So far as I can see that is the only case in his favour, but even that decision was not based on the ground that the transferee had no incumbrance. In that case the purchaser of the whole of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held debarred from coming in under section 170, not because he had no incumbrance but because he had no interest which was valid against the landlord.

The other case in which the opposite party seeks to rely is Mahanti Lal Sahu v. Harkissen Jha (14). In this case Jenkins, C. J. and Chatterjee, J., did not decide the point whether the purchaser of part of a non-transferable occupancy holding was entitled to deposit under section 170. If their Lordships had thought incumbrance and interest were synonymous, they would have forthwith decided against the transferee, but they seemed to be of opinion that it was not necessary to adjudicate upon the rights of a transferee of part of a non-transferable occupancy holding if in fact the holding under consideration was a transferable one. They accordingly remanded the case.

In these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that the weight of authority is against the view taken by Dass, J., in Behary Lal Pau v. Fakir Chandra Roy (15.)

The next question is whether the petitioner's interest is one voidable on the sale. The opposite party contends that it is void and not voidable. In my opinion, there is ample authority for the view that a transferee who is liable to be ejected by the auction-purchaser after the sale has an interest voidable on the sale. And it will suffice to cite in support the judgment of Jenkins, C. J. and Mookerjee, J., in Radhika Nath Sarkar v. Rakhal Raj Gayen (6). The principle is the same whether the subject-matter is a tenure or a holding, and I confess, I have some difficulty in appreciating the difference in this connection between a void and voidable interest.

What the Court sells is the tenure or the holding. Per se the sale cannot be said to avoid anything. By the operation of sections 158 (B) and 195, Bengal Tenancy Act, the sale gives the auction-purchaser the right to step into the shoes of the tenant subject to the limitations and the procedure of Chapter XIV. Whether the person in possession is a transferee by purchase or an incumbrancer, the auction-purchaser cannot on being resisted re-enter without further recourse to law which in the one case is a suit and in the other the special procedure under section 167. If as in Brindarani Choudhrani v. Annoda Mohan Ray Choudry (17), the person in possession is not affected by the decree then ex hypothesi his interest is not voidable on the sale. But where he is so affected the expression "void on the sale" is meaningless. In fact every interest is voidable where the decree and sale give the auction-purchaser the right to re-enter.

It is true that a contrary view was taken in Jotindra Mohan Tagore v. Durga Dabe (11), but that case has been repeatedly dissented from (see the observations of Mookerjee, and Beachcroft, JJ., in Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3) and does not, in my opinion, correctly interpret the law.

And even there the Court although expressing the opinion that the transferee had no voidable interest granted his application to deposit because he had been allowed to deposit on previous occasions. In Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3), the transferee had been in possession to the knowledge of the landlord for over 12 years, but nothing turned on this as the Court did not decide whether he had acquired a tenancy by adverse possession and held that possession qua the landlord was sufficient to give an interest voidable on sale.

Even in Nalini Behari Roy v. Fulmani Dasi (12), which is the opposite party sheet anchor and in which the transferee of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held not entitled to deposit under section 170, the decision was based not on the ground that the transferee did not possess a voidable interest but on the ground that his interest was not valid as against the landlord.

This brings me to the opposite party's third contention which is that interest in section 170 means interest valid against the landlord at least as regards occupancy holdings.

In my opinion this contention must also fail.

It is necessary, however, to examine the decisions on the rights of the purchaser of an occupancy holding.

In Gadadhar Ghose v. Midnapur Zemindari Company (18) it was held that the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding had a right to bring a suit to impeach a rent sale on the ground of fraud and in Brahamdeo Narain Singh v. Ramdown Singh (19) the same power was held to lie in a purchaser of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding. In

(18) 17 Ind. Cas. 126; 16 C. L. J. 141.

(19) 17 Ind. Cas. 125; 16 C. L. J. 139.

MAHADEO LAL v. LANGAT SINGH.

Abdul Aziz v. Tajauddin Sheikh (20) it was held that the transferee of a portion of an occupancy holding can come in under Order XXI, rule 90 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, as he is a person, whose interests are affected by the sale, these words being wider than the corresponding word of Order XXI rule 89, which corresponds to section 310A of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882.

In Azgar Ali v. Asaboddin Kazi (21), it was held that the transferee of a non-transferable occupancy holding is a person whose immovable property has been sold; that he is a representative of the judgment-debtor, and that he can apply under section 173 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3) the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held entitled to deposit, apparently without any decision as to whether the transfer was binding upon the landlord or not. In Bungshidhar Haldar v. Kedar Nath Mondal (22), Benodini Dassi v. Peary Mohan Haldar (23), Kunja Behari Mondal v. Shambhu Chandra Roy (24) and Omar Ali Majhi v. Moonshi Basirudeen Ahmad (25), purchaser of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held entitled to come in under section 310A of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882.

On the other hand in Srimati Nissa Bibi v. Radha Kishore Manikya (26), and Prosunno Kumar Middar v. Bama Churn Mondal (27), it was held that transferee of non-transferable occupancy holding could not come in under section 244 or 311, Civil Procedure Code of 1882. Again in Nalini Behari Roy v. Fulmani Dasi (12) the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held to be not entitled to come in either under section 244 or 311, Civil Procedure Code or section 170, clause 3, Bengal Tenancy Act. In this case on which the opposite party places very great reliance, but the authority of which has been greatly weakened by the Full Bench decision to which I shall refer immediately the judgment proceeds on the basis that each of the above sections contemplates an interest of the same nature, namely, one which is not valid against the landlord.

All the above cases, however, were decided before the Full Bench decision in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy Chowdhuri (2) and it may be urged that in some respects the law has been altered by that decision.

It is necessary, therefore, to see the state of the authorities since the Full Bench decision, which both parties before us have accepted as a starting point. In Sahdeo Singh v. Kuldip Singh (5), the purchaser of part of a non-transferable holding was held entitled to deposit under section 170, Bengal Tenancy Act. Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4) is to the same effect. In Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4) the purchaser of the whole of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held entitled to deposit under section 170. On the other hand the opposite party relies on Mahanti Lal Sahu v. Harkissen Jha (14), but as I have already observed, that case was remanded for the trial of the question whether the land was transferable or not and the point whether the interest of the transferee was valid as against the landlord and what effect the question of the validity had on section 170 was not gone into. In Kali Charan Mahto v. Sheo Narain Singh (28), the Court held that the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding cannot come in either under section 170 of the Bengal Tenancy Act or under section 310 A, Civil Procedure Code of 1882, but that he can come in as a representative of the judgment-debtor, under section 244. This decision to some extent favours the petitioner, also as does Abdul Rahman Sarkar v. Promode Behary Dutta (29), where the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding was held not entitled to come in under Order XXI, rule 89, of the present Civil Procedure Code. The learned Judges in Abdul Rahman's case (29) considered Ahmadullah Chowdhury v. Harkaru Saha (4), but they did not expressly dissent from it. In my opinion, this last case still stands good for the proposition that though the transfer of a non-transferable holding is not binding upon the landlord, it is not a bar to the transferee's paying in money under section 170, Bengal Tenancy Act.

The effect of the Full Bench decision, therefore, is that so far as the transfer of a whole non-transferable holding is concerned the case of Nalini Behari Roy v. Fulmani Dasi (12) has been overruled and Tarak Das Pal v. Harish Chandra Banerjee (3) has been affirmed. The transferee has rights both before and after the sale in spite of the landlord's and the auction purchaser's right of re-entry.

In this Court the case of Rameshwar Singh v. Raghunandan Khawas (1) is in favour of the opposite party but my respectful opinion is that the correct rule has been laid down in the Calcutta High Court that the purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy is entitled to make a deposit under section 170, Bengal Tenancy Act.

With regard to the transfer of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding the two authorities since the Full Bench decision are both in the transferee's favour in the matter of section 170, Bengal Tenancy Act.

Indeed under the Full Bench decision, the transferee of a part is in much stronger position than the transferee of the whole. The Full Bench have decided that the landlord can re-enter at any moment as against the transferee of the whole, but that in respect of a part, he can only re-enter if the transfer effects a surrender or abandonment. If as generally happens in the case of a transferee of a part, there is no abandonment or surrender by the recorded tenant, the landlord's right of re-entry does not arise. The cases, therefore, which are in favour of the transferee of the whole, apply with stronger force to a transferee of a part. And the conclusion which I arrive at is that in spite of some conflict of opinion before the Full Bench decision there is a very substantial preponderance of opinion in favour of the view that unless there is clear provision to the contrary as in Order XXI, rule 89, of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, the right of a transferee by sale particularly a transferee of part of a non-transferable occupancy holding to avoid the sale both before and after the sale has taken place is independent of the validity of his interest as against the landlord.

I am of opinion, therefore, on a consideration of the whole case that the petitioner is entitled to come in under sections 170 and 171, Bengal Tenancy Act.

Indeed on principle, I see no reason why the landlord should not be compelled to receive payment from a transferee in the petitioner's circumstances. A landlord is only interested in receiving his rent. If a transferee is allowed to acquire a mortgage lien under section 171, the landlord's position is in no way worse than if the recorded tenant had mortgaged the holding himself to the transferee. Why then if the landlord is bound to accept a deposit from a mortgagee by private contract should he be allowed to refuse payment from a mortgagee who acquires his lien by operation of law? In either case an outsider is thrust upon the landlord against his will.

Again the petitioner's position as defined by the Full Bench also contemplates that he should be allowed to come in under section 170 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Section 30A, Civil Procedure Code of 1882 was withdrawn from operation, in rent sales in Bengal and Bihar in 1907. Order XXI, rule 89, which requires that the transferee should have an interest which gives him a title as against the landlord would also not protect him. The Full Bench, however, has held him to be competent on the ground of material irregularity and fraud to attack the sale under Order XXI, rule 90, the terms of which are wider than those of Order XXI, rule 89. If he is a person entitled to come in under Order XXI, rule 90, why is he not entitled to pay up before the sale and thus to avoid the chance of further litigation. But then the opposite party says that by withdrawing the money, the landlord will be held to have accepted the petitioner as a tenant. I do not think there is any estoppel in this matter. Indeed clause 4, section 170 of the Eastern Bengal and Assam Tenancy Act was expressly added for the purpose of making this clear.

After all the object of giving the auction-purchaser the power to avoid encumbrance and other interests is not so much to facilitate his obtaining physical possession of the land as to improve his security for rent. So long as this security is not impaired there seems to be no reason why he should be permitted to interfere with the tenant's right of transfer, and if he gets his rent from the transferee he can, unless the land is being used for a purpose contrary to that of the original tenancy, have no ground of complaint. Generally speaking the right of transfer subject to the safe-guards against sub-division of the holding tends rather to enlarge than to cut down the landlord's security.

In this connection it is interesting to note how the Legislature in India has protected transferees from the earliest times. The first enactment with this object was section 13, Regulation VIII of 1819, which directed that money paid by an under-raiyat to protect a superior putni taluk from sale should be considered as a loan made to the proprietor of the tenure preserved from sale by such means and the taluk so preserved should be the security of the person or persons making the advance, who were to be considered to have a lien in the same manner, as if a loan had been made upon a mortgage. The principle was apparently based upon salvage liens in England.

We next find that in the Sale Law of 1845, a personal remedy was given to persons other than recorded co-sharers who are interested to pay the revenue to protect their interest.

In the Revenue Sale Act of 1859 the same provision was made with the addition that if the depositor already holds a lien the amount paid by him shall be added to that lien.

Act X, 1859, which was the first Rent Code, contains no provision for payment of rent by transferees and encumbrancers, but the Rent Act of 1865 extended the provisions of section 13 of Regulation VIII of 1819 to payments made by under-tenure-holders for the preservation of the superior tenure.

We finally come to Act VIII of 1885, when the elaborate provisions of Chapter XIV were enacted for further safe-guarding not only the interests of landlords but also of those claiming rights created by the tenant without the landlord's consent.

The Act, in my opinion, classified interests into protected interests, encumbrances, and interests other than those falling under the above two heads. It does not follow that because it prescribed a special procedure for annulling encumbrances it completely swept away the privilege conferred by Act VIII (B. C.), 1865, on persons "interested in protecting the under-tenures." In my opinion, section 170, Act VIII, 1885, merely re-affirmed the provisions of section 6 of the Act of 1865. We have seen that an unregistered transferee of a part of a tenure had up to 1885 been held to be entitled to acquire a mortgage lien in the under-tenure by payment of the arrears before sale. What reason is there for supposing that this privilege was taken away by the Act of 1885, and if the privilege still exists in respect of tenures then it must also exist in respect of holding for section 170 makes no difference between the two classes of tenancy.

It may be that the landlord in the present case would have been entitled before suing the recorded tenant, to eject the petitioner from the land, and if so, the petitioner's interest would be capable of description as one voidable before the sale, but that is no reason why it should not also fall under the category of interests voidable on the sale. The landlord not having availed himself of his right of ejectment the petitioner is entitled to protect himself under section 170 whether the landlord desires him to stay in the land or not.

The result is that I would make the rule absolute on the following grounds:—

(1) The language of section 170 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is perfectly clear and includes the interest of the petitioner, and if the Legislature had meant that interest means encumbrance it would have said so.

(2) For the same reason interest does not mean "interest valid against the landlord." Section 6, Act VIII (B. C.), 1865, on which section 170 appears to have been modelled makes no such limitation.

(3) The balance of authorities in the Calcutta High Court before the Full Bench decision is in the petitioner's favour and since the Full Bench decision while all in the Calcutta High Court are in his favour, there are none against him in this Court with the exception of Sri Rameshwar Singh v. Raghunandan Khawas (4), which might possibly be distinguished on the ground that it related to the purchaser of a whole holding who is in a worse position with regard to the landlord than the purchaser of a part of a holding.

(4) The policy of the Legislature has always been in case of the transferee, so far as is consistent with the maintenance of the landlord's security for rent.

By THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that the application is dismissed with costs. Hearing fee three gold mohurs.

Rule discharged.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1405 OF 1915.

April 5, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Tudball.

CHATTAR—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT
versus

CHOTE AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—
RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Alienation—Sale, suit to set aside, by minor member—Consideration, major portion of, for legal necessity.

Certain joint family property was sold by the mother and the adult brother of a minor member of a joint Hindu family and it was found that a major portion of the consideration was for legal necessity. On a suit by the minor member to set aside the sale:

Held, that in justice of the case the sale should stand on payment by the defendant-vendee to the plaintiff the amount which was not required for legal necessity. [p. 270, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Aligarh, dated the 28th September 1915.

FACTS.—During the minority of the plaintiff, Murli his brother and Musamat Radha his mother sold a portion of the family property for Rs. 1,000 to the defendant-appellant Chatter in 1911. The plaintiff, on attaining majority, brought this suit for joint possession of the property sold on the ground, among others; that the sale was not for a valid family necessity and the consideration was fictitious. He also offered to pay any sum of money that might be found by the Court to be binding on him. The defence was that Murli as manager of the family sold the property for valid legal necessity and that the plaintiff also benefited by the transaction; that the defendant after the purchase spent Rs. 600 on a well and the plaintiff could not eject the defendant without paying this sum also as this was spent on improvement.

The Court of First Instance found that out of the sale consideration Rs. 852 was for bona fide legal necessity of the family and the rest was not binding on the plaintiff. The Court ordered that the sale-deed be cancelled and the plaintiff be given possession of the property sold on payment of Rs. 852. The Court allowed nothing for improvement. The lower Appellate Court upheld this decree. The defendant then came in appeal to the High Court.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Appellant, submitted that accepting the findings of the Courts below the sale transaction should not have been cancelled. A large portion of the consideration was for a valid family necessity and a very small portion was found not to be binding on the plaintiff. The Courts below should have upheld the sale and should have ordered the defendant to pay back to the plaintiff the portion of the sale consideration not binding on him. He referred to a case of the Madras High Court reported as Rukmani Sundarammal v. Muthammal (1) and to Thalagara Rammanne v. Kalagare Gangayya (2) and submitted that it was only just and equitable that the defendant should keep the property.

He further submitted that the Courts below were wrong in not allowing compensation for improvements. He referred to section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act and Narayana Aiyar v. Sankaranarayana Aiyar (3). In any event the Courts below should not have allowed the plaintiff to take possession of the property without ordering a further payment of Rs. 600 on account of the improvement.

Mr. Nehal Chand, (for Mr. Panna Lal), for the Respondents, submitted that the Courts below were right in setting aside the sale. When a portion of the sale consideration was not binding on the plaintiff it would be unfair to deprive the plaintiff of the family property. The defendant had only a right to be re-imbursed to the extent of the sum of money advanced for legitimate family necessity and which was binding on the plaintiff.

CHATTAR V. GHOTE.

As regards compensation for improvements the defendant was not entitled to anything. He knowingly constructed a well at considerable expense on land, in which he had no title. If such compensations were allowed one may easily be improved out of his property.

He submitted that the principles of the following cases can be applied in the present case; viz., Vinayakrao v. Vidyashankar (4), Tejpal v. Ganga (5).

Mr. Gulzari Lal, not called to reply.

JUDGMENT.—This is a defendant's appeal and the facts out of which it has arisen are as follows:—On the 24th of February 1911 when the plaintiff was about 14 years of age, he and his brother Murli constituted a joint Hindu family and Musammatt Radha their mother was also alive and a member thereof. The property which is now in suit together with other properties was mortgaged usufructuary to certain mortgagees. These mortgages were old and of the time of their ancestor. On the aforementioned date Murli, the elder brother and the mother Musammatt Radha, executed a sale-deed of the property now in dispute for the sum of Rs. 1,000. The money was required to the extent of Rs. 852-8 as found by the Court below for family necessity. It was partly utilised to pay off old mortgages and release other properties and partly to pay off other debts and the expenses of the present plaintiff's marriage. According to the findings of the Courts below, the defendants have failed to prove that Rs. 147-8-0 out of the full Rs. 1,000 was for family necessity whatsoever. The defendant vendee who is the appellant before me, then started to build a well on which he claims to have spent the sum of Rs. 600. The present suit was instituted in the year 1915 by the plaintiff to set aside the sale and to recover possession of the property on the ground that his brother and his mother had no necessity whatsoever to sell the property that it was not for family necessity or benefit that it was sold, and that the sale should be set aside. The plaintiff is but a youth still being between the ages of 18 and 19 and in his evidence he simply admitted that he and his brother Murli, one of the vendors were really fighting this case and wanted to get back the property. The Court of First Instance gave a decree to the plaintiff for possession of the property conditional on his paying Rs. 852-8-0 only to the defendant vendee. The defendant appealed and his contention was that he had established that Rs. 147-8-0 was also taken for family necessity. He further contended that before he was ejected he should be re-imbursed the expenditure which he had incurred in building the well. The Court below dismissed the appeal and upheld the decree of the Court of First Instance. The defendant comes here in second appeal and it is urged before me that as by for the greatest portion of consideration was found to be for family necessity, the Court in view of the circumstances of the case, ought not to have decreed possession of the property to the plaintiff but ought to have maintained the sale conditional on the defendant paying to the plaintiff the sum of Rs. 147-8-0 or his share thereof. In any case it is urged that the plaintiff is entitled, under section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act to compensation for the well which he has built upon the property and which is an improvement. Reliance is placed upon a decision of the Madras High Court in the cases reported as Rukmani Sundarammal v. Muthammad (1) and Narayana Aiyar v. Sankaranarayana Aiyar (3). The only difficulty in the case seems to me to be to decide what relief in the circumstances should be given to the plaintiff. Whether he should be handed over the property and if so whether the defendant is entitled to compensation for the improvement he has made or whether the sale should be allowed to stand and if so on what compensation to the plaintiff. On a consideration of all the facts of the case it seems to me that to do real justice between the parties, the sale should be maintained in view of the fact that so much as Rs. 852-8-0 out of the Rs. 1,000 was for family necessity and to that extent the sale was binding upon the plaintiff. It is obvious from the plaintiff's own statement that the suit is merely a suit brought by him and his brother to rob the defendant although they have had the benefit of the latter's money, and I think that the justice of the case will be met by holding that the sale should stand and by decreeing to the plaintiff sum of Rs. 147-8-0. This will obviate the necessity of deciding the question as to whether the defendant is entitled to compensation for the well that he has built. I, therefore, allow the appeal and modify the decree of the Court below. I direct the defendant to pay into Court the sum of Rs. 147-8-0 to the credit of the plaintiff within a period of two months from to-day's date. If this be done then the plaintiff's claim for possession of the property and the avoidance of the sale-deed, shall be disallowed. If on the other hand the defendant does not pay this money into Court then the decree of the Court below for possession of the property shall stand conditional on the payment of Rs. 852-8-0 without any further compensation to the defendant on account of the well. If the plaintiff do fail to pay this sum of Rs. 852-8-0 within the period of two months after the expiry of the two months allowed to the defendant, then his suit shall stand dismissed with costs in all Courts. The parties will receive and pay costs in proportion to success and failure.

KUNJA BEHARI NAG CHOUDHURY—
PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Adverse possession against lessee when adverse against lessor—Trespasser in possession of demised land—Lessor, right of—Ejectment.

The possession of a trespasser of land let out on lease does not become adverse as against the lessor until the termination of the lease. [p. 273, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a trespasser has been in actual possession of land let out on lease for twenty years is no reason why he should not be ejected from the land by the lessor, unless it is proved that the trespasser had taken a bona fide settlement from a third person whom he believed, in fact, to be the landlord and entitled to let out the land. [p. 273, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, 24-Pergannahs, dated the 6th of January 1915, affirming that of the Munsif, Basirhat, dated the 30th of January 1913.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter and Babu Satindra Nath Mukherjee, for the Appellants.—The plaintiff's case is that he has purchased the lands and he wants to eject the defendants on the ground that they are trespassers or to get a fair and equitable rent assessed upon the lands. Both the Courts have assessed fair and equitable rent but have not allowed the plaintiff a decree for ejectment.

My contentions are as follows.

These lands formed a part of danga patta lands and not banjar patta lands, and whatever these might be, the defendants are in possession for more than fifty years, and have been paying rent to other persons as landlords hence the plaintiff's right is extinguished by adverse possession.

The adverse possession of the defendants against the lessees would be adverse against the lessors. The defendants have been in possession of these lands for a period of over 20 years at least and that possession is adverse to the lessors just as it is adverse to the lessees.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 from a judgment of the Second District Judge of the 24-Pergannahs, dated the 6th January 1915, affirming the decision of the Munsif of Basirhat. The suit was brought by the plaintiff for a declaration of his ganti right to certain chur lands. In kismat patta, there were two portions—the bower patta and the danga patta. The danga patta belonged to a certain number of zemindars and had been divided amongst them. The bower patta belonged to certain zemindars who are now represented by the defendants Nos. 5 to 53. The first lease that was granted of this property appears to have been in the Bengali year 1268. That lease of the bower patta was granted to one Arun Chunder Battacharjee. The lease in its terms excluded 321 bighas of land. Arun in his term granted an under-lease to two persons named Jasimuddin and Gorai Mandal on the 20th Falgun 1271 B. S., corresponding to same date in March 1865. On the 10th April 1901, an intermediate lease was granted to one Dhara Nath Roy Choudhury. Then a rent suit was brought by Dhara Nath to recover rent from Jasimuddin and Gorai Mandal. That suit was decreed and in the sale in execution on the 29th July 1902 Dhara Nath Roy purchased the interest of Jasimuddin and Gorai. Dhara Nath Roy surrendered his ijara right in favour of Arun's son, the present defendant No. 4, on the 19th June 1903 and sold his darganti right to one Pramoda Sundari. Then a suit for rent was brought against Pramoda Sundari in the year 1908 and a decree was passed and the defendant No. 4 purchased the tenure. On the 14th July 1909, the defendant No. 4 sold his right purchased in execution, to the plaintiff. When the plaintiff went to take possession in October or November 1909, he was resisted and the result was that the present suit was started in the month of August 1911.

The first point that was raised in this appeal was as to whether the plaintiff had established that the land sued for in this case was a portion of the land included in the lease to Arun. The question, it strikes me, is eminently a question of fact. But whether it is a question of fact or not, the decisions both of the primary Court and also of the lower Appellate Court show conclusively that this land is, in fact, a portion of the land let out to Arun and that the 321 bighas which might have been bower patta originally bad, on the date of the lease to Arun, became part of the danga patta.

The next argument was on the question of limitation. The appellants before us, according to the findings of both the lower Courts, were for twenty years and upwards in possession of this land and the question that was raised in this appeal was whether the possession of the defendants was adverse as against the lessor during the subsistence of the under-lease. If it was not, it is quite clear, on the facts, that the present suit was brought within time. The decisions in this Court on the point are numerous. But the decisions in favour of the appellants when one reads the cases closely are few and they consist, as far as I can see, amongst others, of the decision in the case of Prosunnomoyi Dasi v. Kali Das Roy (1), a decision of Mr. Justice Princep and Mr. Justice Field. That case has frequently not been followed in this Court. In my own experience while forming a number of a Bench of this Court certainly on one occasion that decision was not followed. The other case referred to is the case of Brindabun Chunder Sircar Chowdhry v. Bhoopal Chunder Biswas (7). That decision also seems to support the argument of the appellants. The other cases that Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter for the appellants has cited in support of his argument do not, when closely read, support the proposition he put forward, because in every one of those cases the Court was deciding a case where the property had been let out to common tenants and the Court drew attention in the course of its judgment to the difference between a case where the property was let out to common tenants and a case where the property was let out in ijara. I do not think that those other cases cited by Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter support the proposition that he wished to make. As against that, there is a large body of authority commencing with the case of Davis v. Kazeed Abdool Hamid (3), which is followed by the decision in Womesh Chunder Goopta v. Raj Narain Roy (4), down to the latest case cited to us, namely, the case of Kishwar Nath Sahi Dev v. Kali Sankar Sahai (5). All these cases decided clearly that where the property was let out in lease, the possession of a trespasser did not become adverse as against the lessor until the termination of the lease. That, I think, is not only established by those cases but is also correct in principle. The difficulties of holding that the possession of a trespasser during the continuance of the lease could be adverse as against the lessor are serious, as has been pointed out in more than one judgment. I think that the learned District Judge in the Court of Appeal below was clearly right when he held that the plaintiff's suit was not barred by adverse possession. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

(6) 2 C. L. J. 125 at p. 138.

(7) 17 W. R. 377.

HAJRA SARDARA V. KUNJA BEHARI NAG.

The other question is the question raised on the cross-objection to the appeal, namely, that, on the findings in this case, the learned Judge ought not to have settled a fair and equitable rent as against the appellants but ought to have passed a decree for ejectment. The learned Judge has found that the appellants are trespassers. He has also found that the case that the defendants set up that they bona fide held the land under a person whom they believed to be the owner thereof, is not a true case. The only reason for which the learned Judge thought that the defendants ought not to be ejected was that they had been in actual possession of the land for some twenty years and that, therefore, it was not equitable that they should be ejected. But if a person has been in actual possession for twenty years and there are no special circumstances such as have been laid down in the cases as to a person taking a settlement bona fide from a person whom he believes to be entitled to the land, the mere fact that he has been there for twenty years is no reason why he should not be ejected. On the contrary it is more reasonable that he should be ejected because he has been in possession of another man's property for a considerable number of years. The decree of the lower Appellate Court in this respect has been attempted to be supported by Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter by two decisions of this Court. But neither of those cases clearly applies to the facts of this case. The first case that has been relied upon is the case of Ishan Chandra Mitter v. Raja Ram Ranjan Chakrabutty (6) and the remarks that are relied on are to be found at page 138. They run as follows:—"In a case like this where the tenant encroaches not in his character as tenant but asserts a hostile title against the entire interest of his landlord, the rule laid down by this Court in the case of Wali Ahmed v. Tota Meah (8) would be applicable, namely, that if a tenant encroaches on the adjoining waste lands of the landlord, his possession of the lands encroached upon can only commence to be adverse when a title adverse to the landlord is asserted or the landlord becomes aware of the encroachment." The present case is clearly distinguishable from that rule, because the encroachment in this case was not an encroachment on the adjoining land of the landlord. These lands do not belong to the persons who are the landlords of the other lands said to be held by the defendants. The only other class of cases is that class where a person has taken a bona fide settlement from another person whom he believed to be, in fact, the landlord and entitled to let out the land. The learned Judge in the lower Appellate Court has found that the case that the defendants set up that they bona fide held the land under a person whom they believed to be the owner thereof was not a true case. The equity that they set up as to long possession which satisfied the learned District Judge is no ground, in my opinion, why they should be permitted to be in possession of the land which the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court has found they are holding possession of as trespassers. I think we ought to allow the cross-objection of the plaintiff-respondent and in lieu of the decree made by the learned Judge settling a fair and equitable rent of the property, we ought to direct that the defendants-appellants before us be ejected from the land in suit. The cross-objection is, therefore, allowed with costs.

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), ss. 9, 25—Failure to make claim for compensation, effect of—District Judge, power of—Compensation—Interest, whether should be awarded.

Where an appellant omits to make a claim within the meaning of section 9 of the Land Acquisition Act, the District Judge is justified in refusing to award anything more than the amount awarded by the Collector under section 25 of the Act. [p. 275, col. 1.]

Interest should be allowed on compensation awarded under the Land Acquisition Act, unless there is special reason to the contrary. [p. 275, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Aligarh, dated the 9th February 1915.

Mr. S. K. Dar, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Ryves and Jang Bahadur Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act. The present appellant was one of several claimants. Notice was duly issued to him under section 9 of the Act. The Collector made an award and he asked for a reference to the District Court. The reference was made. The property which is in dispute before us consists of a plot of land on which there were certain buildings. Compensation was awarded by the Collector for the land at a certain rate per yard and for the building in a lump sum. The appellant claimed before the District Judge a much enhanced value both for the land and the buildings. In so far as the buildings are concerned, the District Judge held that as the appellant had not put in a claim before the Collector in accordance with section 9 of the Act, he under section 25 of the said Act was not empowered to grant any sum greater than that allowed by the Collector. In regard to land the District Judge increased the rate to Rs. 1-8 0 per yard and enhanced the amount of compensation accordingly. No order was passed as to interest by the District Judge even on the excess amount awarded to him. The Collector had omitted to award the statutory allowance of 15 per cent. and this the District Judge has granted. There were two sets of interests, namely, (1) those of the appellant and (2) those of Raja Datta Prasad of Mursan. The appellant held a perpetual lease of the land from the Raja at an annual rent of Rs. 24. Out of the total amount of compensation for the land the Collector had awarded to the Raja a sum of Rs. 600. Both these parties were before the District Court and the District Judge on the Raja's objection increased the sum from Rs. 600 to Rs. 800. The appellant comes here and raises four points. In regard to compensation for the building he contends that the Court below should have gone into his claim and decided it and that the Court was not barred by the terms of section 25 of the Act from enhancing the amount awarded by the Collector. The decision on this point depends on the construction of the petition filed by the appellant in the Collector's Court on the 4th of May 1914. Section 9 of the Act orders a notice to issue to all persons interested inviting them to come forward on the date fixed and to state, first, the nature of their respective interests in the land and secondly, the amount and particulars of claim for compensation for such interests. In regard to the building the appellant in clause (4) of the petition of the 4th of May 1914 stated that this building was occupied by certain tenants on certain rent, but failed, however, to state the amount which he claimed as compensation for this building. He placed no valuation upon the building. Section 25, clause (1), lays down certain limits outside which the District Court upon a reference cannot go in making an award. The amount to be awarded by the District Court cannot exceed the amount claimed by the person interested in pursuance of the notice given to him under section 9. Similarly the amount to be awarded by the Court can not be less than that awarded by the Collector. Clause (2) of section 25 says that when the applicant has omitted to make such a claim, the amount awarded by the Court shall in no case exceed the amount awarded by the Collector. The appellant put forward no claim, in fact he did not fix the amount of his claim for the building, and if the District Court acting under section 25 had treated clause (4) of his petition of the 4th of May 1914 as a claim within the meaning of section 9, then that claim was an unlimited one and the Court could have awarded him any sum it pleased. It is quite clear that the appellant omitted to make a claim within the meaning of section 9, and the Court below was justified in refusing to award anything more than the amount awarded by the Collector for the building. This portion of the appeal must, therefore, fail.

RAM PRASAD v. COLLECTOR OF ALIGARH.

The next point taken is that the Court below failed to decide the question of the area of the land. According to the appellant, the area of the land was 1 bigha 6 biswas, whereas according to the Collector it is 1 bigha and 1 biswa. The point was raised in the Court below and an issue was actually framed on it; but there is no decision on the issue at all. The appellant claims that the correct area should be found as he is entitled to compensation at the rate of Rs. 1-8-0 per square yard for the correct area. We think that this plea is sound and we must send back the record to the Court below with directions to come to a finding on the issue as to what the correct area of the land in dispute is.

The next point relates to the question of interest. On appellant's behalf it is urged that possession was taken on the 15th of July and compensation was not deposited until the 29th of July, and that he is entitled to interest at six per cent. per annum on the sum allotted to him for that period. He also claims that the Court below should have granted him interest on the excess amount awarded by it over and above the amount awarded by the Collector at the same rate. The District Judge in its judgment makes no mention of the question of interest, and it seems that he did not exercise his discretion in the matter under the section. We think that ordinarily interest should be allowed unless there is special reason to the contrary. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed on the question of interest.

There is a fourth matter which is one concerning the lessor and the lessee of the land. The appellant urges that the Court below had no right whatsoever to increase the sum of Rs. 600 awarded to the Raja by the Collector as the value of his interests without any reason. The Raja's interests may easily be valued at twenty five years' purchase of the annual rent which comes to him, that is Rs. 24. It is a fair valuation. The learned District Judge has given no reason for enhancing the sum of Rs. 600 to Rs. 800. No matter to what amount the total market-value of the property might increase, the lessor who has given a perpetual lease at a fixed sum retains the stationary right, the value of which never increases if it does not decrease. The chance of re-entry by the lessor and the chance of the lessee dying without heirs are such that they may be well disregarded. In our opinion the valuation of the Raja's interests at Rs. 600 was a fair and proper one and should not have been increased. At the same time it must be remembered that the Collector omitted to award the statutory allowance of 15 per cent. The District Court has ordered that amount to be entered in the decree. The Raja is, therefore, entitled to Rs. 600 plus 15 per cent. thereon, that is, to a total sum of Rs. 690. On this point, therefore, the appeal must be allowed. Out of the total compensation awarded to the appellant for the land by the Court below, the Raja will get

KRISHNA DAYAL GIR v. LALDHARI GIR.

Rs. 690 including 15 per cent. statutory allowance.

On return of the finding of the Court below on the issue remitted, ten days will be allowed for objections. The case will then be put up when the subject of costs will be dealt with.

The cross-objection filed on behalf of the Collector raises simply a point which arises between the appellant and the Raja. It is a matter with which the Government has no concern. The cross-objection is, therefore, disallowed.

Appeal accepted in part; Case remanded.

Messrs. H. L. Nandkedar, Atul Chandra Dutta, Karlashpati, S. N. Palit and Gobardhan Misra, for the Appellant.

Messrs. S. Sinha Chandra Sekhar Baner and L. N. Sinha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, C. J.—The appellant in this case Krishna Dayal Gir of Bodh Gaya is the mahant of a math or monastery of the Hindu sect of Girs, one of the well-known seven Saivite orders. The math is close to the celebrated Buddhist temple at Bodh Gaya, of which by a strange anomaly the appellant is superintendent. The respondent is mahant of a math of the same sect at Bakrour, a village which is a mile or two away on the other side of the river Phalgu.

The appellant alleges that the Bakrour math is a madhi of, that is subordinate to, the math at Bodh Gaya, that the mahant of Bodh Gaya is the “malik” of all the property of the Bakrour math and that he is entitled to appoint and, for good cause shown, dismiss the mahant of Bakrour, that as the respondent has taken to immoral ways and is ruining the property of the Bakrour math, he dismissed him in May 1912 but the respondent refused to give up possession. On these allegations the appellant claims the removal of the respondent and possession of the Bakrour math and its property. The respondent denies all the material allegations of the appellant. He admits only that the mahant of Bodh Gaya takes a leading part in the election of the mahant of Bakrour.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit. He found that it was not proved that the math at Bakrour was in any way subordinate to the math at Bodh Gaya or that the respondent had taken to immoral ways or had wasted the property of his math. He found that two iqarnamas of 1897 and 1900 on which the appellant relied had been obtained by undue influence and that a compromise between the parties in 1906 and a decree founded thereon were not binding on the respondent.

The respondent has produced a large number of documents beginning from the time of Bhabhut Gir, the first known mahant of Bakrour (Exhibits O to O 16, S, I, J, K, N, M, L, G, F, P, R, Q, B and W, I give them in chronological order), which show that the institution at Bakrour has always been known as a math or asthan not as a madhi, and has always managed its own affairs independently, that the head of the institution has always been called a mahant and has dealt with the property of the math uncontrolled by outsiders. One of these documents (Exhibit S) refers to the election of mahant Phul Gir, the fourth in descent from Bhabhut Gir, by the mahant of Bodh Gaya and other mahants, and it is common ground that on the death of a mahant of Bakrour his successor must be chosen from the chelas or disciples of the deceased.

Tilakdhari Gir, the last mahant but one of the Bakrour math, died in 1897 and was succeeded by his disciple Kali Charan Gir who was then about twenty years of age. This young man in November 1897 executed an iqrarnama in favour of the appellant, in which he admitted that the Bakrour math was subordinate to the math at Bodh Gaya and that on the death of a mahant of Bakrour it was the custom for his disciples to ask the mahant of Bodh Gaya to appoint a successor, accordingly on the death of Tilakdhari Gir that procedure was observed and the appellant decided to appoint him, Kali Charan, on condition that he executed an iqrarnama in favour of the appellant regarding the management of the institution as had always been done. The executant then goes on to undertake that he will manage the property of the math in consultation with the appellant and will not waste or damage the same and he agrees that if he wastes the property, his acts shall be void and the appellant may take proceedings against him. It is also provided that if the executant initiates any disciple who is not qualified according to the custom of the Bodh Gaya math, the appellant may dismiss that disciple. In conclusion it is stated that with the approval of the appellant the executant has borrowed Rs. 4,000 from Gosain Ram Gir. This man was a fellow-disciple with the appellant of Hem Narain Gir, a former mahant of Bodh Gaya, and it is significant that on December 29th, 1898, Kali Charan Gir gave him a power-of-attorney in which he again admitted that the Bakrour math was subordinate to the Bodh Gaya math, and, after stating that on the advice of the appellant he had decided to give a power-of-attorney to Ram Gir, went on to give him extraordinarily wide powers with reference to the math and its property, undertaking that he would not remove him or interfere with him in any way and depriving himself Kali Charan of all power to interfere with the property of the math. Those documents speak for themselves. The Subordinate Judge found that the iqrarnama was obtained by undue influence, as indeed it probably was. On the one side was an inexperienced youth ready on any terms no doubt to accept the coveted position of mahant, and on the other was the most influential mahant in the province anxious as it would appear to extend his sway over the Bakrour math, and able probably by his position to carry the day against any obnoxious aspirant to the gaddi. I do not stop to consider further the question whether it is proved that this iqrarnama was procured by undue influence, for it is obviously not binding on any successor in the office of mahant. If, as I am satisfied, the math at Bakrour had never been in any way subordinate to the math at Bodh Gaya, the execution of the iqrarnama was a most improper proceeding. It was obviously intended to transfer all authority in the Bakrour math to the appellant.

Kali Charan Gir died in July 1900 and was succeeded by the respondent. On this occasion the respondent executed in favour of the appellant an iqrarnamah which went even further than that executed by Kali Charan Gir. It tied down the respondent much more firmly to the Bodh Gaya math besides repeating all the damaging admissions contained in the earlier document. Amongst other things it provided that the respondent should have no power to sell or mortgage any of the property of the math or give any zar-i-peshgi lease or give any other kind of lease for a term exceeding seven years. The execution of this iqrarnama was even more improper than the execution of the document of 1897. It appears from the evidence of the respondent that he executed the iqrarnama in circumstances similar to those in which the earlier iqrarnama was executed. He must have known that he had little or no chance of being appointed mahant if he did not execute the iqrarnama. I believe his statement that the appellant said to him that if he did not execute the iqrarnama, another disciple of Kali Charan would be appointed. Kali Charan had left heavy debts behind him and the respondent was in a difficult position. He even had to borrow Rs. 500 from the appellant for his needs. The appellant has not come forward to explain the circumstances in which the igrarnama was executed or to contradict the allegations of the respondent. In my opinion the execution of the igrarnama was obtained by the appellant by the exercise of most improper influence which the respondent could not resist, and I agree with the Subordinate Judge that it is not binding on him.

More extraordinary proceedings were to follow. In 1905 the appellant brought a suit against the respondent making allegations against him not unlike those contained in the plaint in the present suit. Some evidence was taken and then there was a compromise on which a decree was passed. Two petitions were filed, one by the appellant, the other by the respondent. The former is a short document in which the appellant said that as the respondent had apologised and admitted his fault and withdrawn his denial of the two igrarnamas and had agreed to pay the appellant Rs. 1,550 and interest, he, the appellant, had forgiven him and decided to retain him in the office of 'madhidar.' The petition put in by the respondent is much longer. It begins with a statement that the respondent had for the purpose of preparing his defence made enquiries as to the powers which the Bodh Gaya math had over the Bakrour math and had put in his defence on the strength of statements which had been made to him. In paragraph 3 it is stated that on an inspection of the documents filed by the appellant he, the respondent, had come to know that he had been misled by his informants, and that in fact the mahant of the Bodh Gaya math had always had power to appoint control and remove the madhidar of Bakrour, and the respondent was satisfied that he could not meet that evidence and could not succeed in the case and would be put to unnecessary and useless expense in defending it, therefore, he had asked pardon of the appellant who had been pleased to say that if the respondent withdrew his defence he would be pardoned. The respondent went on to say that if he did anything contrary to the igrarnama the appellant might dismiss him and remove him from the math, and he prayed that the suit might be disposed of according to his petition. This petition appears to contain several misstatements of fact. The appellant does not appear to have produced any documents in that case showing that the Bakrour math was subordinate to the Bodh Gaya math. In the present case he has certainly produced none. His Counsel suggested that he had not produced them in the present case because he thought it safe to rely upon the igrarnamas. But Counsel for the respondent pointed out that the order sheet in the previous case did not disclose the existence of any such documents, and he offered to submit to an adjournment of the hearing of this appeal for two or three months to enable the appellant to produce such documents or to show that he had produced such documents in the former case. The offer was not accepted. There can be no doubt that the appellant has not and never had any such documents. The respondent has described the circumstances in which the compromise was effected. He says that he had been implicated in more than one criminal case which he attributed to the appellant, that while the civil suit was going on the appellant sent for him and threatened to have him sent to jail and harassed in other ways if he did not compromise the case. Two of the appellant's men Ram Chariter and Jaipal Gir got the compromise drafted. Respondent signed it but was not allowed to read it over or show it to any one. The respondent alleges that neither Ram Chariter nor Jaipal Gir was there when the appellant told him to compromise the case. The appellant has not come forward to give his version of the affair. No one can explain how the false allegations in the compromise about the documentary evidence came to be inserted. The respondent's petition of compromise is not signed by Fazilat Hossain who was his Pleader in the case, but by a junior Vakil named Abdul Shakur. Fazilat Hossain says that he was not even consulted about the compromise. The appellant's petition of compromise is signed by his agent Jaipal Gir. This man is admittedly alive but has not been called as a witness. He held a decree against Kali Charan Gir in execution of which he tried to sell the property of the math in the hands of the respondent in 1909, a curious proceeding on the part of a man who had on behalf of the appellant alleged that the property of the math was being wasted by the respondent. The respondent was committed to the Court of Session on a criminal charge brought by Baldeo kahar but he had been honourably acquitted more than a year before the compromise. He speaks of another criminal case instituted by a kaharin but there is no proof that any such cause was ever instituted. It is not proved that there was any connection between the criminal cases and the making of the compromise, but it may well be that the respondent believed that Baldeo's charge had been, as he pleaded in that case, instigated by the appellant and he had no doubt a wholesome fear of the appellant's power for good or evil. Amongst other defences the respondent had pleaded that even if his igrarnama was binding on him it did not give the appellant power to dismiss him on the case put forward by the appellant. It seems to me that on that plea alone the appellant's case was bound to fail and he must have known it. The igrarnama gave power to dismiss only in the event of unsuitable chelas being initiated. It is noticeable that a clause in the compromise is intended to remove all possible doubt on that point. All the circumstances suggest that the respondent was unable in any way to resist the appellant. I am of opinion that the compromise was the result of pressure improperly exerted by the appellant. The respondent's petition of compromise is obviously not the petition of a free agent. It was designed to make the appellant's hold over the respondent still stronger than it already was.

The appellant contends that any defences that there may be in the compromise are cured by the decree which was passed on it and that the respondent is estopped from denying the appellant's power to dismiss him. We have been referred by Counsel for the appellant to a number of cases in which the question for decision was how far a decree obtained against a mahant or shebait is binding on the institution and on his successor-in-office, and to cases in which it has been held that a decree on a compromise is as binding as a decree passed after a contest. Such cases appear to have no bearing on the present case. Here we have a compromise whereby the head of a religious institution gives away or sells its rights and renders himself and the institution subordinate to the mahant of another institution who had no business to interfere with him. The respondent had no authority whatsoever to enter into the agreement embodied in the igrarnama and compromise. The decree passed on it by the improper consent of the parties does not make the agreement lawful. The compromise ought never to have been sanctioned by the Court.

In Raja Vurmah Valia v. Ravi Vuramah Kunhi Kutty (1) it was held by the Privy Council that in the absence of a proved custom the assignment by the urallars (managers) of a pagoda of the right of management thereof was beyond their legal competence under the Common Law of India, and in Gnanasambanda Pandara Sannadhi v. Velu Pandaram (2) it was held by the same Tribunal that a sale by hereditary trustees of a religious endowment of their hereditary right of management and a transfer of the endowed property were null and void. In Gajapati v. Bhagavan Doss (3) the defendant on his appointment by the plaintiff as mahant of a math had executed a document whereby he undertook to render accounts to the plaintiff. The Court said:—

“We think the defendant's undertaking...to furnish accounts cannot operate to alter his status so as to render himself liable to dismissal for not furnishing accounts. If he was not by the terms on which he held his office liable to render accounts, he could not, by any voluntary promise on his part, impose on himself an obligation which had no legal existence. The obligation to render accounts does not appear to form part of the usage of the institution, nor does it appear that the provision...for rendering accounts was ever acted upon until the demand before suit. No instance of a zemindar having ever dismissed the head of this math, or having appointed a chela other than the one nominated by the head of the math, is proved. It is urged that it was open to the zemindar to appoint any chela at his discretion. In this case it is not necessary to determine the precise nature of the zemindar's right of appointment. It is sufficient to observe that he did appoint the defendant and his right of appointment is a qualified right and does not necessarily involve the power of dismissal. It was for the plaintiff to prove his right to dismiss the defendant and we agree with the District Judge that he has failed to do so."

In Prayad Das v. Mohunth Kriparam (4) it was held that the head of a math could not transfer the right of management to another person or even transfer his rights to the mahant of a superior math.

These cases illustrate the rule that the head of a religious or charitable institution has no power to bargain away his office or alter the constitution of the institution of which he is in charge. In Lakshmanaswami Naidu v. Rangamma (5) the Court declined to give effect to a decree passed on a compromise whereby the judgment-debtor had agreed that his office in a certain temple might be sold in satisfaction of the decree. That was a very strong case for the Court was actually executing the decree.

The last case to which I shall refer is that of Great North-West Central Railway Company v. Charlebois (6). A company had entered into a contract which was ultra vires, and a consent judgment had been obtained on the contract in an action in which the question of ultra vires was not raised or discussed. Their Lordships of the Privy Council said:—

"It is quite clear that a company cannot do what is beyond its legal powers by simply going into Court and consenting to a decree which orders that the thing shall be done. If the legality of the Act is one of the points substantially in dispute, that may be fair subject of compromise in Court like any other disputed matter. But in this case both the parties, plaintiff or defendant in the original action and in the cross-action, were equally insisting on the contract.....Such a judgment cannot be of more validity than the invalid contract on which it is founded."

The right to remove the mahant of the Bakrour math has never rested with the appellant in the past and he cannot acquire that right or take it out of the hands of the Court or other lawful authority by inducing the mahant for the time being to agree to surrender that right to him. The Court is, in my opinion, bound to uphold the rights of the head of the math.

Lastly I am of opinion that the appellant has failed to prove by any satisfactory evidence that the respondent is living an immoral life or has wasted the property of the math. On this, having examined the evidence, I have nothing to add to what the Subordinate Judge has said.

The length to which the appellant is prepared to go is shown by the contention advanced on his behalf that the appellant is entitled to a decree merely because leases have been granted for more than seven years in contravention of the compromise.

I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

One G. held a contract from the defendants for certain work to be done for them. After some negotiations with the plaintiffs he wrote to the defendants' agent on the 15th October 1910, stating that he was giving a power-of-attorney to plaintiffs to sign for all payments on his behalf and saying that such power-of-attorney was to hold good till the work was finished. will be made to them on production of G.'s power-of-attorney in their favour. G. executed the power-of-attorney on the 18th of October, authorising the plaintiffs to recover all sums due to him from the defendant on the contract.

Plaintiffs, having made certain advances to G., claimed payment from the defendants under the terms of the power-of-attorney, but were met by the plea that nothing was due to G. at the time when the power-of-attorney was produced:

Held, (1) that the power-of-attorney was in fact an assignment in the plaintiffs' favour and the defendants' agent should have ceased to make payments to G. after it was first produced; [p. 282, col. 2.]

(2) that according to the terms of the agreement, the power-of-attorney could not be cancelled till the work was finished and the accounts finally settled and that, therefore, a letter from G. dated the 1st January 1911 to the defendants' agent cancelling the power-of-attorney did not exempt the defendants from the liability created under the agreement; [p. 283, col. 1.]

(3) that the defendants were consequently liable for all payments made to G. after the date of the first production of the power-of-attorney. [p. 282, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Simla, dated the 28th July 1913, dismissing the claim.

Bakhsbi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

The Government Advocate, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In the autumn of 1910 Mr. G. H. Geyer, trading as Messrs. Geyer and Co., held a contract from Government for work on the Simla Hydro-electric Construction Scheme. The work was to be done at Basantpur, some miles from Simla. Mr. Geyer had but little financial backing, and approached plaintiffs' firm for assistance. The result was that on 15th October 1910 Geyer wrote to Mr. Aikman, Superintending Engineer, the letter Exhibit D1 printed on page 20 of the paper book, stating that to facilitate handling of cash at the site he was giving a power-of-attorney to plaintiffs to sign for all payments on his behalf, and saying that such power-of-attorney was to hold good till the work on the scheme was finished and accounts between himself and Government finally settled, and adding that plaintiffs would be glad to hear from Mr. Aikman that he agreed that all payments should be made to them as attorneys of Geyer and Co. The letter ends by saying that the writer was anxious to settle the matter the same day as plaintiffs were to start shops to supply his coolies with food. Mr. Aikman wrote to plaintiffs the same day, saying: "on production of Messrs. Geyer and Co.'s power-of-attorney in your favour all payments due to them will be made to your firm on their behalf" (see Exhibit-D2, page 20).

On 18th October 1910 Geyer and Co. entered into an agreement with plaintiffs (Exhibit P-III, pages 3 and 4) agreeing to give them a power-of-attorney authorizing them to draw from the Executive Engineer, Simla, all sums due; plaintiffs were to open shops and supply the coolies with food at certain rates; plaintiffs were to get no payments till 15th December 1910 and after that were to be paid fortnightly "as the Executive Engineer has agreed to measure and pay fortnightly." Interest was to be charged at 9 per cent. per annum.

The same day he executed a power-of-attorney (see Exhibit P-4, page 5) in plaintiffs' favour, authorizing them to recover all sums due to him from Government on the contract. The power-of-attorney winds up by saying that it can be cancelled only after all payments for work have been finally settled.

Plaintiffs say they advanced to Geyer and Co. in cash and provisions Rs. 12,800, out of which they have recovered Rs. 3,000. Plaintiffs sue Government for the balance Rs. 9,800 plus Rs. 1,319-7-0 interest with costs and future interest.

Defendant's main plea is that the power-of-attorney was never produced till 2nd May 1911, when nothing was due to Geyer and Co. Plaintiffs allege that the power-of-attorney was produced in the end of October 1910 and again in December 1910.

The issues framed were:—

(1) Did plaintiffs show the power-of-attorney to Captain Battye, Executive Engineer, at the end of October 1910 or at the beginning of December or not till 2nd May 1911?

(2) What was owing to the firm of Geyer and Co. on the date when plaintiffs first showed their power-of-attorney to the Secretary of State's agent?

(3) Do P-1 and P-2 make defendant liable for all the money owing at any time from Geyer and Co. to plaintiff, or only to such amount as defendant owed Geyer and Co. on the date on which the power-of-attorney was first shown to Captain Battye and subsequently.

BUTA MAL LACHHMAN DAS V. SECRETARY OF STATE.

(4) In view of plaintiffs' laches in suing defendant No. 3 (Mr. Geyer, now dead) and now giving up the claim against him, does the suit not lie?

(5) Is P4 improperly stamped, and if so what stamp should it bear?

The learned District Judge holds that Mr. Aikman's letter only pledged Government to pay such sums as might at any time be due to Geyer and Co., when the power-of-attorney was produced. He holds that it was produced on 19th December 1910, but that nothing was then due to Geyer and Co., that as plaintiffs were only attorneys and not assignees, payment to the principal is equivalent to payment to the attorney and absolves defendant from liability to the plaintiffs. So the District Judge dismissed the suit, allowing defendants half costs.

A claim for interest on a sum of Rs. 3,000 forms a portion of plaintiffs' claim. This will be discussed later on in this judgment.

The first question to consider is, what constitutes "production" of the power-of-attorney. The District Judge says such a power may be used in one of two ways; either the original or a certified copy may be handed over to the person who is to act upon it for him to keep in his own possession, or the attorney may keep the power and produce it from time to time as occasion demands. The power-of-attorney was never made over to defendant's agents for them to keep. Nor was it produced on frequent occasions. We fail, however, to see when once the power-of-attorney had been produced, the defendant's agents should not have acted on it from that time. The District Judge holds that a production at any given time could only bind defendants as regards sums due to Geyer and Co. at the time of that production, leaving them free to pay to Geyer and Co. any sums which might become due on any later date. We cannot agree with this. Messrs. Geyer and Co.'s letter Exhibit D-1 clearly shows that the power-of-attorney spoken of was one to hold good till the work on the scheme was completed and payments were finally settled. The power-of-attorney itself shows the same. So it should have been clear to the defendant's agents that plaintiffs were financing Geyer and Co. on the security of all sums due to the latter from Government and that the power-of-attorney was in fact an assignment in plaintiffs' favour. Mr. Aikman's reply to Exhibit D-1 led plaintiffs to suppose that Government agreed to such an assignment, and so plaintiffs secured the power-of-attorney and commenced to finance Geyer and Co., believing that on production of the power-of-attorney defendant's agent would for the future make all payments to them and not to Geyer and Co. It would obviously be unfair to plaintiffs to say on one day when the power was produced, "Nothing is due at this time to Geyer and Co." and to say at a later production, "Nothing is due to-day to Geyer and Co., because we paid him up-to-date yesterday." We hold that the defendant's agents should have ceased to make payments to Geyer and Co. after the power-of-attorney was first produced.

The next question is, when was the power-of-attorney first produced. Plaintiffs say it was produced in the end of October 1910. On this point we have the oral evidence of Badri Das plaintiff (page 31), and of Rechpal Singh (page 32), who say it was shown to Captain Battye, Executive Engineer, in his house at Basari. The former says "we said we had come to show him the mukhtarnama; he said, 'very good, keep the mukhtarnama yourselves.' The latter says: "The mukhtarnama was given into the Sahib's hand. The Sahib read it. The Sahib said, "when the time for payment comes I will remember and you shall be paid." This oral evidence is not at all convincing in our opinion. Badri Das speaks of the power being again shown early in December, but here again there is only his oral evidence. Captain Battye says he first heard of the existence of the power-of-attorney at the end of October 1910, but never saw the contents of the document till 2nd May 1911. He says that on December 19th Panna Mal saw him in his office and showed him some papers saying he had a power-of-attorney, on which Captain Battye told him if he wished to be paid he should take the power-of-attorney to the office and get it examined. Captain Battye says he then thought the power was in vernacular, which he cannot read. Without impugning Captain Battye's veracity, the question still remains how far his memory may be trusted as to minute details. In his letter of the BUTA MAL LACHMAN DAS v. SECRETARY OF STATE.

30th December 1910 to Geyer and Co. (pages 15 and 16) Captain Battye says "on December 19th Panna Mal returned and produced the power-of-attorney."

This was a letter written only eleven days after the 19th December, and we think we must accept it as written at a time when Captain Battye's memory was fresh. It seems clear to us that the document was produced on 19th December 1910, and that if Captain Battye did not then take the trouble to read it, it was not plaintiffs' fault. We consider that after this production defendant's agents should have stopped making payments to Geyer and Co. Yet payments were made on 20th December, 16th January, 30th and 31st January 1911. Captain Battye was no doubt in a difficult position. He had to get the work finished somehow or another before the beginning of the next Simla season. Geyer was in financial difficulties. Captain Battye says he explained to Panna Mal on 19th December that if he (Panna Mal) seized the money due to Geyer and Co., he would cut his own throat, and advised him to help the contractor through a difficult time. So to prevent the breakdown of the contract Captain Battye continued to make payments to Geyer and Co., but he did so at his own risk, for he knew or should have known that if plaintiffs would not recover from Geyer and Co., they would claim from Government repayments of sums paid to Geyer and Co., in defiance of Mr. Aikman's undertaking after the production of the power-of-attorney. Captain Battye's letter to Geyer and Co., dated 17th January 1911 (page 17), shows that he knew that Geyer and Co. owed plaintiffs Rs. 11,000. Yet we find him making payments to Geyer and Co. on 30th and 31st January. As to the letter from Geyer and Co. to Captain Battye, dated 5th January 1911 (page 21), cancelling the power-of-attorney, the terms of the power show that it could not be cancelled till the work was finished and accounts finally settled, so Captain Battye could not act on this. And it does not appear that Captain Battye did act on it, for in subsequent letters to plaintiffs we find Captain Battye making no mention of any such cancellation, but telling them that they have been misinformed as to Geyer and Co.'s contract with Government having been cancelled.

Then it is argued on behalf of defendant that plaintiffs broke their agreement with Geyer and Co. We can find no proof that they broke down in their undertaking to supply food for the coolies. What apparently plaintiffs did was to refuse to supply Geyer and Co. with cash to an unlimited extent, and in this we think they acted with common sense. They had never agreed to finance Geyer and Co. to an unlimited extent.

Then it is argued that the payments made to Geyer and Co. on the 20th December 1910 and 31st January 1911 were not sums due, but advances. From a departmental view these payments may be called advances, as the strict rule is to pay when the bills have been passed but there is nothing to show that work to the extent to which payments were made had not been done, so these payments we regard as payments made for work done but paid in advance of settlement of work bills.

The whole trouble is due to Messrs. Geyer and Co.'s peculiar methods of doing business. But we cannot see that this relieves Government of the necessity of reimbursing the plaintiffs who clearly were led into financing Geyer and Co., on the undertaking given in Mr. Aikman's letter.

We hold then that defendant is liable to pay plaintiff whatever sums plaintiffs advanced to Geyer and Co. up to an extent not exceeding payments made after 9th December 1910 by defendants to Geyer and Co. We already know the latter payments.

They were (see page 34)

Paid on 20th December 1910	4,000	0	0
Paid on 16th January 1911	5,056	15	6
Paid on 30th January 1911	2,229	3	11
Paid on 31st January 1911	4,000	0	0
GRAND TOTAL	15,286	3	5

These payments are more than sufficient to cover the whole of plaintiffs' claim.

But paragraph 9 of the plaint, in which plaintiffs say Rs. 9,800 principal is still due to them, was traversed by defendant, and yet no issue on the point was framed, and so plaintiff has still to prove that Rs. 9,800 is due to him. There must be a remand on the issue, what principal sum is due to the plaintiffs.

As to interest the agreement between plaintiffs and Geyer and Co. provides that plaintiffs are not to be paid till 15th December 1910, and that any sums then due are to carry interest at 9 per cent. We think, therefore, that plaintiffs should get interest on each sum advanced at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum from date of actual advance or from 15th December 1910, whichever date is later, till date of institution of suit, and thereafter at 6 per cent. per annum till date of payment.

As to the claim for interest on the Rs. 3,000, this sum of Rs. 3,000 was advanced by plaintiffs to Geyer and Co. on Captain Battye's guarantee that it would be refunded next month, "if necessary by deductions from their bills," see letter of Captain Battye dated 29th October 1910 (page 5). Yet the money was not paid till 2nd May 1911. This should have been deducted from the December pay bills, which were apparently payable on or before 15th December 1910 (see clause 5 of the agreement, foot of page 3), though apparently the bills were actually paid on 10th and 12th December 1910 (see foot of page 33). We think plaintiffs are entitled to interest from 15th December 1910 to 2nd May 1911 at 9 per cent. per annum on the sum of Rs. 3,000.

We now remand for enquiry on the issue, what sum is due to the plaintiffs as principal.

Return to be made within four months.

Appeal accepted; Case remanded.

LACHHMAN PRASAD, SINCE DECEASED (NOW REPRESENTED BY NARAIN PRASAD

versus

SARNAM SINGH AND OTHERS—

RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Joint family—Mortgage by member—Property to extent of mortgagor's interest, whether can be made liable—Equity arising out of representation of authority.

Where the property of a Hindu joint family is mortgaged by one of the members, not being the head of the family for an antecedent debt or proven necessity of the joint family, the general law is that the mortgage is not valid at all, even to the extent of the mortgagor's interest. [p. 285, col. 1.]

It is possible, however, that exceptions to this general rule may arise from special circumstances, e.g., from a representation or undertaking by the mortgagor that he had power to mortgage the joint property. [p. 285, col. 2.]

Mahabeer Pershad v. Ramyad Singh, 12 B. L. R. 90; 20 W. R. 192, discussed.

Appeal from a decree of the Allahabad High Court, dated December 11th, 1912, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Bareilly.

FACTS of the case are sufficiently set out in their Lordships' judgment. Three members of a joint family (the first three defendants) mortgaged the joint property to plaintiff, who brought a suit on his mortgage. The Subordinate Judge, on the authority of Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad (1), held that the mortgage was invalid and dismissed the suit and his decision was confirmed on appeal by the High Court. Hence this appeal.

Messrs. J. M. Parikh and J. K. Roy, for the Appellant.

Respondents did not appear at the hearing.

Mr. Parikh, for the Appellant.—The recent judgment of the Board in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (2) precludes me from questioning the principle of Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad (1), but I submit that relief can be granted in equity against the mortgagor's share: Mahabeer Pershad v. Ramyad Singh (3).

[VISCOUNT HALDANE.—That case was decided on the ground that the father and the eldest son had in effect made a misrepresentation which they had to make good. Here there are no such special circumstances as to create an estoppel.]

The case is discussed by this Board in Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (4), where it was said that the Judges deciding it justly considered that it was contrary to equity and good conscience that the mortgagors should keep the security and the money. As to representation, there is just as much evidence of it here as there was there.

[VISCOUNT HALDANE.—I am not at all sure the Board gave the weight of their authority to that Bengal case.]

The mortgage here is voidable only, not void. If the other side had not opposed, plaintiff would have got a decree.

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—In this case no difficult question of law arises, and their Lordships are prepared to intimate at once the advice which they will tender to His Majesty upon the appeal.

It is a suit with regard to a mortgage made on the 21st September, 1885, by three Hindus subject to the Mitakshara Law, who joined in borrowing Rs. 1,200 on the security of the property of the joint family of which they were the heads. There is nothing special in the terms of the mortgage, which do not go beyond what is stated. It is contended that although according to the decisions of this Board, that mortgage is prima facie invalid, as being for neither an antecedent debt nor for any proven necessity of the joint family, it still may be held to be valid on the doctrine laid down by the High Court of Calcutta in the case of Mahabeer Pershad v. Ramyad Singh (3). There, the head of a joint family and his son, who was of age, united in attempting to raise money. There was a younger son, also a member of the joint family who was not of age and who did not, and could not, concur. The mortgage was declared bad, but the learned Judges who decided the case thought themselves at liberty to put a condition into the decree which in effect determined that an implied representation or undertaking given by the mortgagors that they had power to charge the joint family property and would make good the representation by partition or otherwise, should receive effect, and accordingly they, in substance, ordered by their decree a partition of the property so that the separate shares to be obtained under the partition of the father and the son should be made payable to the mortgagees. Whether that particular case was rightly decided or not, it is not necessary to consider here, because the learned Judges proceeded upon the footing that there had been the representation referred to. On looking at the facts, their Lordships agree with the observation of Mr. Parikh that there was very little, if any, evidence of such a representation, but that there was such a representation was the basis of the judgment, and, unless the learned Judges had held that an equity arose out of it, their judgment would have amounted to this, that for every mortgage by the head of a joint family the property of the joint family could be made available to the extent of the interest of the mortgagor. Now, whatever may happen where there are special circumstances such as there were in the case referred to, that is not the general law. The general law is quite plainly laid down by Lord Watson in delivering the judgment of this Board in the case of Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (4), where he says, at page 196, this:

"Any one of several members of a joint family is entitled to require partition of ancestral property and his demand to that effect, if it be not complied with, can be enforced by legal process. So long as his interest is indefinite, he is not in a position to dispose of it at his own hand and for his own purposes; but, as soon as partition is made, he becomes the sole owner of his share, and has the same powers of disposal as if it had been his acquired property. Actual partition is not in all cases essential. An agreement by members of an undivided family to hold the joint property individually in definite shares, or the attachment of a member's undivided share in execution of a decree at the instance of his creditor, will be regarded as sufficient to support the alienation of a member's interest in the estate or a sale under the execution."

Now these are the principles which govern this and all other cases of the kind, and, according to these principles, there can be no doubt that the present mortgage is void. There were no such special circumstances as the learned Judges seem to find in the first case above quoted entitling them to impose terms upon the plaintiffs, and, whether Lord Watson approved that case or not, which is not quite clear, he at all events said that it had no application which would affect the operation of the principles which he laid down as above quoted.

The result is that the mortgage in the present case is bad and the appeal fails, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that it should be dismissed with such costs as the respondents, not having appeared before this Board, may be entitled to.

Appeal dismissed.

BUDH SINGH AND OTHERS—

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Joint family—Partition, suit for, dismissed, though right to partition admitted—Status, whether joint or several.

A member of a Hindu joint family instituted a suit for partition. The suit was dismissed on the ground that though he had a legal right to partition, he had in the Judge's opinion no proper motive for exercising that right. Thereafter he mortgaged his share in the family property, and on the mortgagee suing on his mortgage he claimed to be still joint:

Held, that notwithstanding the judgment the mortgagor had become separate from the date of his suit and that the mortgage of his share was valid. [p. 287, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Allahabad High Court, dated April 10, 1913, reported as 19 Ind. Cas. 430, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Saharanpur.

FACTS of the case are sufficiently set out in their Lordships' judgment. The suit for partition filed by Prabhu Lal was not only instituted but dismissed before the mortgage, which was in fact intended to provide funds for an appeal. Such appeal was not, however, proceeded with, a compromise being effected, under which Prabhu Lal did in fact become separate. When a suit was brought on the mortgage, he and the other members of the family, who were joined "as a precautionary measure", set up that they were joint and the mortgage invalid. The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit, but the High Court (Richards, C. J., and Banerji, J.) dismissed it on the ground that at the date of the dismissal of the suit for partition the mortgagor was joint.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., for the Appellants.—The only question is whether the mortgagor was joint or separate when he executed the mortgage. I contend that from the date of instituting his suit for partition he was separate: Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (1) which was decided subsequent to the High Court judgment under appeal. It is immaterial that by an erroneous judgment the suit for partition was dismissed: the filing of that suit was unequivocal intimation of plaintiff's desire to separate, and he became separate from April 6, 1889. The Subordinate Judge in dismissing the suit said: "It appears that the plaintiff is now thinking of wasting the family property, and having found no other means, he has instituted this suit without there being any actual cause of action. I must admit that the plaintiff has certainly a share in the joint ancestral property equal to that of his father, and he can also get the property partitioned under the Hindu Law: but this admission does not warrant the institution of a suit in Court without the accrual of any cause of action."

[SIR WALTER PHILLIMORE.—He has confused "cause of action" with motive.]

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—You sat down under the judgment.]

[VISCOUNT HALDANE.—The learned Judge may be wrong but he has delivered a judgment and you have to show that you are not bound by it. He has refused to give you partition.]

The only refusal is a refusal to divide by metes and bounds. The Sub-Judge admitted that Prabhu had one-fifth share and could get the property partitioned under Hindu Law. He does not say that Prabhu did not unequivocally express his intention to separate. I submit that his filing the suit was such an unequivocal intimation. The High Court went wrong by regarding the question as being whether actual physical partition had taken place. They had not this Board's judgment before them.

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—They do not seem to have applied their minds to the question whether separation can be effected by volition].

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court at Allahabad which reversed a judgment of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur. The question which arose was whether a mortgage of certain interests in land was valid, as contended by the appellants, who were the successors-in-title of the original mortgagor. The land had been the property of a joint family subject to Mitakshara Law, and the controversy turned on whether the respondent Prabhu Lal, the mortgagor, had separated from the joint family before executing the deed, and so rendered himself competent to make a valid hypothecation of the interest which had come to him as a member of the joint family.

Prior to the mortgage, which was dated the 28th August 1890, the respondent Prabhu Lal had, on the 6th April 1889, commenced a suit for partition. By his plaint he had claimed a fifth share of the family property, and their Lordships entertain no doubt that the claim amounted to an intimation to the defendants, his co-sharers, of the unequivocal desire of the plaintiff for separation from the joint family. If this be so, the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the recent case of Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (1) renders it beyond question that the commencement of this suit for partition effected a separation from the joint family. It is immaterial, in such a case, whether the co-sharers assent. A decree may be necessary for working out the result of the severance and for allotting definite shares, but the status of the plaintiff as separate in estate is brought about by his assertion of his right to separate, whether he obtains a consequential judgment or not.

These considerations are sufficient to dispose of the only serious question raised by the present appeal. Had their Lordships' judgment in the case just referred to been delivered before and not after the judgments now under review, that of the High Court would probably have been different. The Subordinate Judge thought himself bound to examine a number of transactions from which he drew the inference that the members of the joint family had assented to the severance contended for, although a complete partition had not been carried out. It was not necessary for him to find so much in order to establish the severance, but the result at which he arrived was right. The High Court, in reversing his decision, proceeded on the footing that no agreement for severance had been established, and that it was necessary that the existence of such an agreement should be shown. This is plainly contrary to the principle as subsequently laid down by this Board in the other case. It has been argued that the suit for partition, commenced by the plaint of 1890, was dismissed and that the plaint was, therefore, of no effect. Their Lordships cannot assent to this argument. It is true that in the suit of 1890 the Subordinate Judge dismissed the claim disbelieving the case put forward in support of it, namely, that the father, who was head of the joint family, had refused to supply his son Prabhu Lal with the funds required to maintain him, and had otherwise ill-treated him. The High Court says that, while this disbelief was no valid ground for dismissing a claim for partition, it still shows that on the date when the suit was dismissed the family remained joint. It will, however, be observed that the judgment in that suit proceeded on the ground that owing to the age of the father he might have other children and that in consequence the property could not be divided or the plaintiff's share fixed. But, while this was obviously wrong, the judgment on its face concedes that the plaintiff had a right to partition, although no cause of action for an actual partition was regarded as having accrued. It cannot be said that the plaint did not amount to such an expression of intention as to satisfy the conditions of the law as now settled.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, (Government Pleader), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—In these appeals, which are brought by the Government of Bombay, the only question for decision is whether a bicycle is or is not a vehicle within the meaning of the word as used in clause (b) of section 61 of the Bombay District Police Act, Bombay Act IV of 1890. That clause provides a penalty for any person who "drives a vehicle of any description" otherwise than on the left side of the street along which he is travelling. The learned Magistrate has thought that a bicycle is not a vehicle. We are clearly of the contrary opinion. A bicycle is a carriage and is, therefore, in our opinion a vehicle.

We further think that no difficulty is created by the use of the word 'drive', and that a bicycle may be said to be a vehicle driven by the man who rides it. That is the view which was accepted in Taylor v. Goodwin (1), where it was contended that the person propelling the bicycle drives it, inasmuch as he guides the machine and regulates its pace. Mr. Justice Mellor in giving effect to that argument observed: "I think the word 'carriage' is large enough to include a machine such as a bicycle which carries the person who gets upon it, and I think that such person may be said to 'drive' it. He guides as well as propels it, and may be said to drive it as an engine-driver is said to drive an engine"

The decisions of the Magistrate must, therefore, be reversed and the cases must be remanded to him in order that they may be retried and decided in accordance with law.

A Sanitary Inspector, not empowered to exercise the powers of a Police Officer, can initiate proceedings under the Madras Town Nuisances Act. [p. 290, col. 1.]

He cannot put in a charge-sheet or submit a Police report to the Magistrate, but the mere use by him of a printed form appropriate to offences under the District Municipalities Act for embodying the substance of his complaint will not render the prosecution illegal when the document was treated as a complaint under section 190 (1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code and the complainants examined under section 200. JUDGMENT.—These are appeals by Government against acquittals of several accused persons who were charged before the Bench Magistrates of Erode with offences under the Towns Nuisances Act III of 1889, section 3 (5). The ground of the acquittal is as stated in the order "that the Chief Sanitary Inspector is not competent to prosecute for offences under the Act." We think that what the Bench really meant was that the Sanitary Inspector had no power to put in a charge-sheet, that is, make a Police report of the facts as provided in section 190 (1) (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code and they seem to have held that the proceedings in these cases were initiated in that manner. They are in error in this matter, but their error has been induced by the use by the Sanitary Inspector of a printed form headed "Charge-sheet of individuals prosecuted" which form is appropriate to offences under the District Municipalities Act in cases where the Governor-in-Council has under section 282 (4) empowered a "servant of the Municipality" to "exercise the powers of a Police Officers."

Admittedly the Sanitary Inspector is not so empowered. If the Magistrate who took the case on his file had accepted this document as a Police report, the proceedings would have been contrary to law, but it is clear that he treated the document as a complaint under section 190 (1) (a) and examined the complaint under section 200, the substance of the complaint being reduced to writing and signed by the complainant as required by the same section. This appears on the document itself. The Code does not require a complaint to be in any particular form and this document is an "allegation in writing to a Magistrate with a view to his taking action" within the definition of complaint in section 4 (1) (h) of the Code. The proceedings were, therefore, properly instituted and we must reverse the acquittals and direct the Magistrates to take the cases on their file and dispose of them according to law.

Appeals allowed; Acquittals set aside.

The power of a High Court to direct admission to bail under section 498 of the Criminal Procedure Code is unfettered and in no way limited by the provisions of section 497 (1) of the Code; but the High Court will not grant bail in non-bailable offences except when special circumstances are disclosed. [p. 291, col. 1.]

Application against the order of the Sessions Judge, Hyderabad.

Mr. F. J. De Verteuil, for the Applicant.

Mr. E. Raymond (Public Prosecutor for Sind), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

PRATT, J. C.—This is an application under section 498, Criminal Procedure Code, to release on bail the applicant who is now under trial in the Sessions Court of Hyderabad, for an offence of rape. The Sessions Judge refused the bail.

The discretion of the Court in the matter of bail under section 497, Criminal Procedure Code, is limited and in accordance with sub-section (1) of that section the Court shall not release the accused on bail if there appear reasonable grounds that he has been guilty of a non-bailable offence.

The power given by section 498 is not so limited. The Calcutta High Court in the case of Ashraf Ali v. Emperor (1) has said that the extended powers to the High Court under this section are not to be used to get rid of the very reasonable and proper provision of section 497, Criminal Procedure Code. If this case implies that the power of a High Court in the matter of bail is limited by section 497 (1) we must respectfully differ. The section imports no such limitation and we think it was intended that the jurisdiction of the High Court should be left unfettered. We think the rule accepted by the Bombay High Court in the case of Emperor v. Nensi Hansraj (2) is an appropriate one in regard to applications in the High Court and that is that bail should not be taken in non-bailable cases except in special circumstances. What those special circumstances are is a matter which does not permit of precise definition and the discretion given under section 498 is one that should be exercised according to the exigencies of each case.

In the present case the Rule was granted as it appeared from the Sessions Judge's order that he based his refusal of bail solely on the fact that the accused had been committed for trial and had not considered the evidence himself. We do not desire at this stage to say anything which might have the effect of pre-judging the case, and, therefore, we shall merely observe that after hearing the Counsel for the defence and the Public Prosecutor for Sind and considering the evidence in this case as summarised in the order of commitment we do not think that the case is one which invites the application of section 497 (1), Criminal Procedure Code, or that there are special circumstances justifying the exercise of the extended powers under section 498.

We accordingly discharge the Rule.

CROUCH, A. J. C.—I agree that the High Court when passing orders under section 498, Criminal Procedure Code, is not limited by the restrictions imposed by section 497 (1) on a Court before which a person accused of a non-bailable offence is brought; but that when bail has been refused by the Sessions Court it should not be granted by the High Court unless special grounds are disclosed. I consider that in this case no special grounds have been disclosed.

ORDER.—In this case the first point for consideration is whether the charge under section 409 of the Penal Code against the accused Venkataranga Josiar can be proceeded with inasmuch as he had been previously tried by a Magistrate with second class powers upon the same facts for an offence under section 406 of the Penal Code and acquitted.

We think section 403, sub-section 4, Criminal Procedure Code, applies; it states that if a person has either been acquitted or convicted of an offence but the same facts disclose an offence which could not be tried by the first Magistrate, then the previous acquittal or conviction is no bar to further proceedings for a more serious offence. The words of the sub-section are "A person acquitted or convicted of any offence constituted by any acts may, notwithstanding such acquittal or conviction, be subsequently charged with, and tried for any other offence constituted by the same acts which he may have committed if the Court by which he was first tried, was not competent to try the offence with which he is subsequently charged." Then the illustrations (f) and (g) make it perfectly clear that if the subsequent charge is with relation to an offence which the first Magistrate could not try, then the previous order of acquittal or conviction with respect to the minor offence for which the accused has already been tried, is no bar to subsequent proceedings.

In the exercise of our powers of revision and for other reasons we quash the proceedings.

To justify an order of transfer under section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the apprehension of not receiving a fair and impartial trial must be a reasonable apprehension in the opinion of the Court, and not such as would merely appear reasonable to the accused, [p. 293, col. 2.]

Mr. T. G. Elphinston, for the Applicant.

Mr. E. Raymond (Public Prosecutor for Sind), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for transfer of a criminal case pending before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Tando, Sub-Division of the Hyderabad District. The applicant Wali Mahomed was City Magistrate of Hyderabad and has been charged with bribery and corruption, and it appears his case was specially referred for trial before the European Sub-Divisional Magistrate in charge of the Tando, Sub-Division, Hyderabad District.

It has been urged on behalf of the applicant that he is under reasonable apprehension that he will not receive a fair and impartial trial before the Magistrate. Several minor reasons have been urged but the main grounds advanced have been that his Pleader was unduly checked in cross-examination; that the papers of the preliminary departmental enquiry were not allowed to be shown in cross-examination to the witnesses called by the prosecution; and that the applicant's Pleader was only grudgingly given permission to submit arguments against a charge being framed by the Magistrate.

Now it has not been established to my satisfaction that the cross-examination was unduly checked, for it has been stated and not denied that the Magistrate was equally strict with the Pleader for the prosecution in requiring explanations as to the relevancy of the questions put. It cannot be admitted that such an attitude is improper as it is the duty of every Magistrate to check prolix or irrelevant examination or cross-examination of witnesses and to prevent all unnecessary prolongation of trials. But the Magistrate must be careful in performing that duty to avoid all appearance of leaning to one side or the other or of denying the accused person full opportunity for developing his defence. For denial of such opportunity would afford good ground for setting aside the proceedings on appeal.

With regard to the refusal to allow the papers of the departmental enquiry in original to be placed before the witnesses in the course of cross-examination it has not been shown that any questions arising out of these papers were excluded by the Magistrate. And though it might perhaps have been better if the papers had been called for and read out in original to the witnesses. Yet the relevant portions appear to have been brought to the attention of the witnesses from the copies which had been obtained and there would appear to be no reason why the original papers should not be demanded and if necessary hereafter put on the record should the accused be called to enter upon his defence. Should the demand be refused this again might be a proper matter for consideration on appeal.

With regard to the grudging permission given to submit arguments against the framing of a charge it is not necessary to consider whether such arguments can be submitted as of right because whether grudgingly or not the permission was given and the charge has not yet been framed by the Magistrate. Should full opportunity not be afforded for such arguments, that again might be a proper matter for consideration on appeal.

It has been assumed in arguments that the real question to be considered is whether the applicant is actually under apprehension of not receiving a fair and impartial trial; that is to say it has been assumed that the apprehension required to justify transfer is such apprehension as would appear reasonable to the applicant and in support of that reference has been made to the case of Crown v. Mahomedshah (1). But the apprehension to be established appears to me rather to be an apprehension reasonable in the opinion of the Court as pointed out in the case of Juggan v. Empercr (2). No such reasonable apprehension has, in my opinion, been established upon the matters so far brought to the notice of this Court. It has not, in other words, been made so to appear that a fair and impartial enquiry or trial cannot be had in the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Tando, Sub Division of Hyderabad District, so as to justify an order of transfer under section 526, Criminal Procedure Code.

FAWCETT, A. J. C.—I concur, I do not think the allegations urged in support of the application for transfer really give the applicant reasonable grounds to apprehend that he will not have a fair trial before the Magistrate, which in various reported cases is the test that has been adopted in deciding with an application for transfer under section 526, Criminal Procedure Code.

But I entirely agree with my learned brother that, though no doubt such a reasonable apprehension may be a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the High Court, still it is not in itself decisive. The section does not say a transfer may be ordered in any case where it is made to appear to the accused that a fair and impartial enquiry or trial cannot be had but where that is made to appear to the High Court; and, therefore, what is contemplated is that the Court itself should be satisfied on that point and that the real test is not what the accused may reasonably or unreasonably have been led to think about it.

Application rejected.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

The Police of Pegu sent accused Kasi Chetty up for trial under section 406, Indian Penal Code, for committing criminal breach of trust. After the examination of two witnesses and when the third witness was being examined the Counsel for the accused raised the question of jurisdiction under sections 179 and 181, Criminal Procedure Code, stating that according to the evidence of two principal witnesses the rice was sent from Waw Railway Station to Rangoon by the complainant's clerk; that the accused under instructions from the complainant took delivery of the rice in Rangoon, sold it to traders in Rangoon, and misappropriated the sale proceeds in Rangoon after making false report that they were robbed by a Chinaman.

The Pleader for the prosecution contended that the accused was entrusted with the tanza i.e., railway receipts in Pegu to take them to a Chetty Firm in Rangoon and sell them or rather the rice after taking delivery of it from the Railway Company and pay the proceeds to another Chetty Firm in Rangoon for safe custody.

As I have said above the complainant through his clerk sent some rice bags by rail from Waw to Rangoon, and then give the railway receipt to the accused in Pegu to go to Rangoon and sell the rice to a certain Chetty Firm i.e., to S. A. R. M. Firm in Rangoon and to deposit the proceeds with A. I. V. R. P. Firm also in Rangoon.

There is no doubt that the Rangoon Courts have jurisdiction to try the case against the accused. The question whether the Pegu Courts have also jurisdiction is a difficult one as there is no direct authority either for or against this question.

The question is whether the railway receipts which the accused received in Pegu can be held to be the property which is the subject of the offence. It will be remembered that the money which the accused is alleged to have dishonestly misappropriated is not the property which the accused received from the complainant at Pegu. It is the sale proceeds of the rice bags, which he took delivery of in Rangoon with the railway receipts he received at Pegu.

As it is doubtful whether this Court has jurisdiction to enquire into or try this case because this case raises some nice questions of law the proceedings will be submitted to the High Court for decision under section 185, Criminal Procedure Code, whether the railway receipts which the accused received in Pegu are within the meaning of the words "any part of the property which is the subject of the offence" in section 181 (2), Criminal Procedure Code, so as to give this Court jurisdiction to enquire into or try the offence.

Submit proceedings accordingly with this report.

ORDER

Fox, C. J.—It appears to me to be quite clear on the complainant's own evidence that the property which is the subject of the offence is the money which was received by the accused on sale of rice. No part of the property was received in Pegu and consequently the Magistrate at Pegu has no jurisdiction to enquire into the offence in the Pegu District. The money was admittedly received in Rangoon and if it was misappropriated the offence was committed in Rangoon.

This case is transferred under section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to the Court of Eastern Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Rangoon for enquiry

The accused was prosecuted in respect of a very serious offence, an offence punishable under section 377 of the Indian Penal Code. After a perfectly fair and normal trial the accused was discharged by the Trial Magistrate who found it unnecessary on the evidence to call upon the accused to enter upon his defence. The order of discharge was made so far back as the 21st of June. In the following August the District Magistrate directed that further inquiry should be made into the case by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and against that order this Rule was obtained.

There is no doubt that the District Magistrate has jurisdiction to make the order for further inquiry which he has made. But it is important for us now to see whether in making that order he exercised his judicial discretion properly or improperly. For it is obviously an exceedingly serious thing that a man on the same set of facts should twice be exposed to a prosecution of so grave a character as this. The limits within which the discretion to order a further inquiry should ordinarily be exercised are stated in the Full Bench decision in Queen-Empress v. Chotu (1), a decision which shows that those limits are rather strictly confined. I do not think that in conferring this special power upon the District Magistrate the Legislature ever intended that the power should be exercised promiscuously whenever the District Magistrate, who has not seen the witnesses, forms a different estimate of their value from that which was formed by the Magistrate who did see them. Yet in substance that is all that has happened here. The District Magistrate prefers his own appreciation of the evidence to that of the Trial Magistrate. We are not trying this man over again, but at the same time I am bound to say that the reasons given by the District Magistrate in support of his own view as to the weight of the evidence are certainly not convincing to me. The main reason which appears to have influenced the District Magistrate is that, as he says, "I cannot believe readily that a deliberately false case of this disgusting kind should have been concocted." Now it is familiar knowledge to all connected with the administration of the criminal law that this kind of offence is very often chosen by people who are bringing a maliciously false charge. In the present case it is also noteworthy that the little boy's mother is admittedly a woman of bad character so that there would be nothing repugnant in supposing that she had instigated her son to bring this charge without good reason.

I need not consider the reasoning of the District Magistrate in further detail, because the ground upon which I would make this Rule absolute is that the District Magistrate was wrong in ordering a further inquiry merely upon the strength of his own appreciation of the evidence in a case where the accused had had a perfectly fair trial reaching a lawful conclusion and the Trial Magistrate's discussion of the evidence had, as here, been apparently quite reasonable.

Rule made absolute.

Criminal Reference made by the Sessions Judge, Noakhali, dated the 5th September 1916, against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Noakhali, dated June 26th, 1916.

FACTS.—The complainant arrived at the F Railway Station just when the train was about to start, and having no time to buy a ticket, he got into the train without one. The accused, travelling ticket-checkers, asked him to show his ticket, whereupon he explained the circumstances to them and offered to pay the fare and the penalty. This the accused refused to accept and at the next stoppage asked complainant to get out and buy a ticket. On his refusal to do so, he was forcibly ejected and beaten by the accused. The latter were convicted by the Sub-Divisional Officer of Noakhali under section 323 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25 each. The accused then moved the Sessions Judge of Noakhali who made a reference to the High Court under section 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Babus Manmatha Nath Mukerjee and Prabhat Chandra Dutt, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—We think the Magistrate was right in convicting the accused under section 323 of the Indian Penal Code.

There is no provision in the Railways Act for ejecting passengers except in certain circumstances, such as are specified in section 120. Section 122 of the Railways Act of 1890 is not applicable to this case. The term "railway" as defined in section 3, clause (4), excludes railway carriage. The term "rolling stock" as defined in section 3, clause (10), includes it. There is no provision corresponding to section 3, sub-clause (10), in the old Acts of 1854 and 1879. Section 68 prohibits travelling without a pass or ticket, but so to travel without intent to defraud is not a criminal offence. Here there is a distinct finding that there was no fraudulent intent. Section 113 provides that a person so travelling shall be liable to pay on demand by any railway servant an excess charge. This section corresponds to sections 31 and 32 of Act IV of 1879. It is to be noticed that there was no provision in the Act of 1879 for payment of an excess charge, which is somewhat in the nature of a penalty. Taking that provision in connection with the fact that travelling in a railway carriage without a ticket, but without fraudulent intent, has not been made punishable, we think that the Magistrate has taken an entirely correct view of the law. Pratab Daji v. Bombay Broda v. & Central India Railway Co. (1) was a civil case which arose out of a claim for damages for wrongful detention and removal of a passenger. It was decided under the old Act, which has since been amended and altered. The expression "railway" in section 122, as already stated, does not include a railway carriage. In addition to the definitions, a comparison of section 120 and section 122 leads to the same conclusion. Railway servants are public servants. They are to act within the four corners of their statutory powers. It was held in Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Co., (2), by Lord Esher, M. R., that no one had any right to lay hands forcibly on a passenger in the absence of some legal authority to do so. Lindley, L. J., and Lopes, L. J., agreed in that view and held that the Company's servants were not justified, in the absence of any by-law or regulation, in laying hands on a passenger.

The main and primary purpose of sections 68 and 69 of the Indian Railways Act is to prevent persons from travelling in fraud of the Company without having paid the necessary fare, and that the obligation to show the ticket, when required, is subsidiary only to such primary purpose. Travelling without a ticket is not a criminal offence, as has been repeatedly held in this Court. It is the frequent practice of ticket-checkers to take money and issue tickets to passengers, who may have got into a train in a hurry, without tickets, as appears from the evidence. In this case the complainant was perfectly willing and offered to pay the fare together with any excess that might be chargeable. Under the circumstances, it would be absurd to hold that the ticket-checkers concerned were legally justified in committing the acts charged against them. The least that can be said about the acts complained of is that they were extremely high-handed. The complaint was that the accused had abused the complainant and got him out by force and kicked him and given him a beating, that he was kept confined the whole night and was released the next day. The learned Magistrate has found the two accused guilty under section 323 of the Indian Penal Code, and gave them his benefit of his doubt as regards the charge under section 342. The learned Magistrate has also found that the injuries on the person of the complainant were caused by voluntary blows and that those blows were given by the accused with their fists. It is clear that the accused used more force than was necessary for the purpose of removal. The learned Sessions Judge says that, although it is not a case of trespass as defined in the Penal Code, it is at least a civil trespass, and that the owners are entitled to use their common law rights. This is due to his having overlooked the position of a Railway Company and its servants. He has overlooked the fact that they as such cannot, in a case like this, claim common law rights. Where is there again a "common law right" to inflict blows on a man with fists if he refuses to move?

Ticket collectors and checkers are expected to conduct themselves with restraint and self-control. We are disposed to think that they have been leniently dealt with in this case, and refuse the reference. The judgment of the Magistrate, we may add, is characterized by great ability and care.

Conviction upheld.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 110, 367—Evidence—Appellate Court, duty of—Judgment, nature of Findings to be supported by reasons—Evidence, examination of.

It is the duty of an Appellate Criminal Court to show by its judgment that it has duly weighed and examined the evidence against the accused, has appreciated the points both for and against him, and has brought a judicial mind to bear upon the case. Its findings must be supported by reasons, however brief they may be. [p. 298, col. 1.]

Where the judgment of a District Magistrate was, "It is obvious that if one quarter of the evidence for the prosecution is true, and I see no reason to doubt that it is, the appellant is a most proper person to be bound over under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code."

Held, that it was no judgment at all and could not stand. [p. 298, col. 1.]

Mr. St. George Jackson, for the Applicant.

The Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision against an order of the District Magistrate of Sitapur passed on appeal from an order of a Magistrate under which the applicant was directed to furnish security for good behaviour under section 110, Code of Criminal Procedure. In revision I am not disposed to question the findings of a Court of Appeal as to the value of evidence, and had the District Magistrate arrived at a finding stating which of the witnesses he believed on the one side or the other, I should not have been inclined to interfere with such a finding in revision, because the reasons given were brief. But in this particular case it is difficult to see that there is a finding at all. The learned District Magistrate says: "It is obvious that if one quarter of the evidence for the prosecution is true, and I see no reason to doubt that it is, the appellant is a most proper person to be bound over under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code." Had the District

RAMKARANLAL v. EMPEROR.

Magistrate stated that he found that certain witnesses for the prosecution were telling the truth specifying who those witnesses were I should take no exception to his conclusions. But I cannot regard the finding in question as satisfactory. A case similar to this came before Mr. Justice Tudball in February of this year, Sarwan v. Emperor (1). Mr. Justice Tudball stated therein: "The law gives a person in the position of the present applicant a right of appeal to the District Magistrate. He is in simple justice entitled to have the evidence in the case against him duly weighed and examined, and it is the duty of the District Magistrate to show by his judgment that he has done so; has appreciated the point both for and against the appellant and has brought a judicial mind to bear upon the case."

As the appeal has, in my opinion, not been properly tried it must be re-tried according to law, and while setting aside the order of the District Magistrate I consider it advisable that the hearing of the case should be sent to another Court. I accordingly direct that the hearing of this appeal be transferred to the Court of the District Magistrate of Lucknow.

The Hon'ble Mr. M. R. Dixit, for the Applicant.

Mr. G. P. Dick (Standing Counsel), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT—The applicant has been convicted of an offence under section 277, Indian Penal Code, for spitting into a well. There was a complaint made by one Punaram against the applicant's son of spitting into the well. This annoyed the applicant and he himself spat into the well.

It has been proved that the well belongs to Pahlad Patel who allows the public to use the water for drinking purposes. As held in Reg. v. Wellard (1), a place is a public place if people are allowed access to it, though there may be no legal right to it. So, a well is a public well, if people are allowed to use its water. It has been found that the well is the source of drinking water in the plague camp. This disposes of the first contention raised on behalf of the applicant.

It is urged that a stray act of expectoration, however, objectionable, is not an offence under section 277, Indian Penal Code. The case of Empress v. Pandia Mahar (2) is relied upon for the applicant. There it was held that the expression "corrupt or foul" is used in a literal sense in the sense of physical defilement. A person of low caste who draws water from a public well, was accordingly held not to have committed an offence under section 277. This case does not help the applicant in the least. Nobody will deny that a tumbler of water is fouled by a stray act of expectoration and is rendered less fit for drinking. It may not be possible to prove by chemical or bacteriological examination that the water is contaminated in the well by such an act, but I think the water is rendered less fit for drinking purposes, though the degree to which it is rendered less fit might be small. The case of Punni Besoyi, In re (3) appears to support the view taken by the lower Courts. There the accused fished with basket nets in a tank, the water of which, was used for drinking. "The use of the baskets caused a slight disturbance of the mud and so made the water rather less fit for drinking. But the damage done was very slight." The conviction was upheld by the Madras High Court.

There is no doubt the accused "voluntarily" fouled the water. The conviction seems to me to be correct. The application is, therefore, dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Criminal revision against the order of the District Magistrate, Kheri, dated the 21st December 1916; upholding that of the Magistrate, Kheri, dated the 23rd November 1916.

Mr. St. George Jackson, for the Applicants.
The Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an appellate order of the District Magistrate of Kheri upholding an order passed by a first class Magistrate under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in respect of the two applicants Khushal and Tika Ram. It appears that notice was issued to these two persons to show cause why they should not be made to furnish security for their good behaviour. It was stated in the notice that the charges against them were (1) that they were habitual receivers of stolen property (2) that they habitually committed mischief and (3) habitually committed extortion. There have been placed before me certain papers which were prepared previous to the institution of these proceedings. From these papers it appears that a report was made by the Manager of the Court of Wards to the Deputy Commissioner of the Kheri District in which it was stated that these two accused now before me had brought six false suits against tenants of the village in which they lived. The village I am told is in one of the Court of Wards' estates. It appears that three of the suits so instituted were dismissed by the Subordinate Judge; three others which were referred to the Manager of the Court of Wards as arbitrator were dismissed by him. The Manager seems to have come to the conclusion that all these suits were false and it was on his suggestion that criminal proceedings were initiated against the present two applicants. It appears to have been thought that the best way to deal with the accused was to put forward these six instances of suits which were brought and were dismissed, in order to make out a case of habitual extortion against these applicants and it was this incident of the bringing of these suits which led to the charge of habitually committing extortion. The Deputy Magistrate has held that, it having been proved that these six suits were instituted and that they were dismissed apparently on the ground that they were all false, he is entitled to find that the two applicants are habitual extortioners. The learned District Magistrate in his order in appeal has endorsed that opinion. In my judgment both the Courts below are wrong. A case quite similar to the present one is reported in the Punjab Record for 1884 [see Ganesh v. Empress (1)]. In that case it was pointed out by Plowden, J., that section 110 could not be made to apply to the case of the accused, even if it were granted that such an accused had the reputation of habitually bringing false claims in the Civil Courts. As was pointed out by the learned Judge a person who brings a claim in the Civil Court which he knows to be false, commits an offence punishable under section 209 of the Indian Penal Code, but he does not by so doing commit an offence either, if he succeeds, of extortion, or if he fails, of attempting to commit extortion. As the learned Judge points out the proper way to deal with a person, who is on sufficient grounds supposed to have brought a false claim, is to prosecute him under section 203. It is quite clear to me, therefore, that so far as the charge of habitual extortion is concerned the present case cannot stand. Then it seems there was also a charge of habitually committing mischief. As regards this the evidence is very meagre and it seems as if the Magistrate who tried the case thought that no sufficient evidence had been given to support this particular charge. The Magistrate observes with respect to some of the witnesses who gave this vague evidence about the habitual commission of mischief that they were interested witnesses, and it appears to me that he was not disposed to put much reliance on their statements. As regards the story that the accused are habitual receivers of stolen property. I have examined the evidence very carefully. It seems to me that this charge cannot be supported on the evidence which was led before the Magistrate. A number of witnesses who spoke about this reputation of the applicants admitted that their opinion was based upon the facts that several years before the present proceedings were brought a man had been arrested at the house of these accused who had afterwards been run in for theft. It was apparently supposed that he had come there for the purpose of disposing of stolen property which these accused were ready to purchase. Another similar instance is described by some of the other witnesses: taken altogether the evidence on this point seems to me to be practically worthless. I might add in conclusion that after having perused the note made by the District Magistrate with respect to this case before it came into Court it was not proper for him to try the appeal, he ought to have had it transferred to another Court for disposal. I allow the application, set aside the order of the District Magistrate and direct that the applicants be discharged.

Revision accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145—Crops, dispute as to—Jurisdiction—Attachment.

The right to make collections or to appropriate the crops or produce of a village or shares in a village comes within the purview of section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 301, col. 2.]

A Magistrate has jurisdiction under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code to pass an order restraining the disputing parties from interfering with the crops stored in the threshing floor or to attach such property. [p. 302, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, Behar (Patna).

Messrs. Ashgar and Lakshmi Kanta Jha, for the Petitioner.

Messrs. Krishna Sahai and Amir Hossain, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application arises out of an order under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure whereby the property in dispute has been declared to be in possession of the second party. The property in dispute is said to be 5 dams 16 kauris share in a village called Sapao Nuawan, Tauzi No. 1162/4.

The first party claimed possession over the aforesaid share by virtue of a certain amaldastak dated the 5th of Chait 1323, corresponding to 25th of March 1916, granted to him by one Muhammad Kasim and Musammat Zobaida the proprietors of that property. The second party claimed possession over $10\frac{1}{2}$ dams share which they said belonged to the aforesaid two persons, by virtue of an amaldastak and patta dated the 3rd of June 1916. The 5 dams odd claimed by the first party is included in the $10\frac{1}{2}$ dams claimed by the second party.

The Magistrate's finding is in the following words: "My finding is that the second party was given the theka of $3\frac{1}{2}$ dams share for one year i.e., 1324 under the amaldastak and of 7 dams under the registered patta for seven years and was put in possession by the registered proprietors." Just previous to the above finding the Magistrate held that the evidence of possession adduced by the first party was not at all reliable, and did not prove the possession claimed by that party.

The first question raised by the applicant is that the orders of the Magistrate is ultra vires inasmuch as it relates to a certain share of paddy crops which is a moveable property and not an immoveable property and that section 145 does not apply to moveable property.

I was a member of the Bench that issued the Rule on the application of the petitioner and I understood that the proceedings under section 145 were instituted in respect of the paddy crops stored in the khalian and not in respect of any immoveable property. This impression found support in the first paragraph of the judgment of the Court below where it was stated that "there existed a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace between the parties aforesaid with regard to the appropriation of the share of the paddy crops of 5 bighas 16 kauris interest in village, etc."

The dispute, no doubt, came to light on account of the crops stored in the khalian and the Police reported that there was a danger of a breach of the peace. The report sets out the history of the dispute and is clear from that report that the dispute between the parties was regarding the collection of rents of the share belonging to the owners from whom both parties claimed to have the disputed share in lease. Upon the Police report of the 2nd of March 1917 the Magistrate issued an order under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedures and fixed the 20th of March for the hearing of any cause that might be shown by the parties. On the 20th of March the parties filed written statements and upon a consideration of the written statements and the report of the Police the Magistrate came to the definite conclusion that the dispute really related to the possession of the share of the proprietors from whom each party claimed to hold a lease. The Magistrate, therefore, passed the following order:—Heard parties. This is a dispute about immoveable property. Draw proceedings under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, and serve on all concerned". From the aforesaid order of the Magistrate it is clear that the dispute was regarding the possession of 5 dams 16 kauris share of Muhammad Kasim, and Musammam Zobiaida in village Sepao Nuawan. It is clear that whatever may have been the reason for instituting the proceeding under section 144 and whatever may have been the manner whereby the Magistrate came to know of the dispute between the parties the proceeding actually was instituted under section 145 in respect not of the crops in dispute between the parties but in respect of the possession of the aforesaid 5 dams 16 kauris.

I, therefore, hold that the Magistrate had jurisdiction to take action under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The second contention of the learned Counsel for the applicant is that the proceeding is without jurisdiction inasmuch as it relates to a share of village and does not relate to the entire village or to any specific lands in the village which could be demarcated or delineated by means of boundaries. This contention is probably based upon the expression used in section 145, namely, "concerning any land or water or boundaries thereof". The above expression is to be read with clause 2 to section 145 which says that land or water includes among other things crops or other produce of land, and the rents or profits of any such property. There is to my mind, therefore, no doubt that the right to make collections or to appropriate the crops or produce of a village or shares in a village properly comes within the purview of section 145.

PUNIT MAHTON v. SIRAJUL HAQ.

I am fortified in this view by the decision in Abhayessari Debi v Shidhessari Debi (1) where it was distinctly held that a dispute as to the right to collect rents was a dispute concerning tangible immovable property within the meaning of section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This decision followed the earlier decision in Pramatha Bhusana Deb Roy v. Doorga Churn Bhattacharji (2). The contention that these decisions apply only to a dispute regarding the collection of rent in respect of an entire village and not of a share or shares of a particular village does not appear to me to be sound, particularly in a case where the share in dispute is separate from the other shares in the village and where each party claims to be in exclusive possession and not in joint possession of the share. It appears from the evidence of witness No. 1 on behalf of the petitioner himself that the collection of this share is quite separate from the other shares in the village. The witness referred to above is the patwari of the village and there is no reason why his evidence should not be accepted regarding the mode of collection in the village as a matter of fact nothing has been shown on behalf of the petitioner to the contrary.

I, therefore, hold that the Magistrate had jurisdiction to initiate proceedings under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in respect of the dispute as to the possession of the share in question.

The next contention of the learned Counsel on behalf of the petitioner is that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to direct the attachment of the crops which were not standing on any portion of land situated within the share in dispute but were at the time that the order was passed stored in the threshing floor. It appears that it appeared to the Police that there was danger of a breach of the peace regarding the crops stored in the khalian and the Police reported to the Magistrate for action being taken under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and in the meantime the Police kept watch over the crops so that they may not be removed by either party.

(1) 16 C. 513; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 339.

(2) 11 C. 413; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1035.

The Magistrate on the 7th of March on the report of the Police passed the following order “* * * in the meantime the Police to see that no breach of the peace takes place.” On the 9th of March the Magistrate passed an order for the issue of notices under section 144 on the parties.

In these two orders the Magistrate did not make any direction regarding the crops. On the 20th of March when the Magistrate finally passed his order for taking proceedings under section 145 instead of section 144 the Magistrate made the following order as regards the crops: “Under clause 4 to section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, I attach the subject-matter of dispute and direct the Police concerned to keep the paddy standing thereupon in charge of a responsible person.” The order of attachment of the Magistrate only related to the subject-matter of dispute i. e. 5 dams 16 kauris share and not to the crops in question. As regards the crops his direction was that the Police should keep the paddy standing on the property in dispute in charge of some responsible person. From the summary of the proceedings taken in connection with the crops and the orders passed by Magistrate referred to above I think that there was no order by the Magistrate attaching the crops. Under section 144 the Magistrate had power to direct any person to abstain from a certain act; and thus, in my opinion, the Magistrate had in this case power to order the parties to refrain from interfering with the crops in any way. I think that the order restraining the disputing parties from interfering with the crops implied that the Police should see that the crops were not in any way removed by any body. The action of the Police and of the Magistrate in keeping the crops in charge of a responsible person, therefore, appears to be within the powers vested by sections 144 and 145.

The last contention of the learned Counsel is that the crops should be directed to be placed in the khalian where they were found as the khalian is not in dispute but is outside the village.

When by the final order under section

MATHURA PRASAD v. EMPEROR.

145 possession has been declared to be with the second party, the crops being the profits of the property in dispute belong to the second party. The first party is found not to be in possession of the share in dispute and cannot, therefore, claim the crops in question. The order of the Magistrate making over the crops to the second party was also, therefore, a proper order after the adjudication of possession of the disputed property in favour of the second party.

I, therefore, decline to interfere with the order made by the Magistrate and I dismiss this application.

Application dismissed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 408—Criminal misappropriation—Retention of money entrusted to servant—Offence—Proof.

The retention of money by a servant or clerk for fifteen months after its receipt raises a very serious doubt of bona fides against him, but the mere retention is not conclusive proof of criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust. [p. 304, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Allahabad, dated the 4th December 1916.

Messrs. C. Dillon, U. S. Bajpai and Ram Narain, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—Mathura Prasad has been convicted of an offence under section 408, Indian Penal Code. He appealed from the Court of first Instance to the Court of the Sessions Judge of Allahabad, who dismissed the appeal. He comes here in revision. Speaking generally the findings of the Court below are accepted in revision; but there is nothing to prevent this Court from going into the evidence if occasion arises to doubt the findings arrived at by the Courts below upon the facts before them. In the present case the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge does not give one much help in determining the case, and the Assistant Government Advocate very properly laid before me the judgment of the Joint Magistrate who has gone very fully into the evidence before him. But on hearing that judgment it seemed to me that there was reason to apprehend that the learned Joint Magistrate had relied for his decision of the case rather upon the weakness of the defence than upon the completeness of the prosecution. Briefly put, the facts are as follows:

On the 21st of May 1915 Mathura Prasad, who was at the time sarbarakar of an estate known as Chilonda Estate, received certain moneys handed over to him by Parmeshar Dial who in turn had received them from a Pleader called Gajadhar Prasad as costs which had been given in a case in favour of the Chilonda Estate. The Chilonda Estate forms part of an endowment founded by Rani Gomti Bibi. This fact is admitted by the accused. It is also admitted by him that the moneys in question were not deposited in the treasury of the estate until the 12th of September 1916. There is evidence which has not been contravened that in the interval between the 10th of April 1916 and the 12th of September 1916 Sardar Santokh Singh, who is a Deputy Superintendent of Police in the Criminal Investigation Department, while engaged in investigating into another case quite apart from the present and in no way connected with it found that these moneys had been received by Mathura Prasad and had not at the time when he was investigating, namely, on the 16th of April 1916, been deposited in the treasury of the estate. The evidence against the accused consists of statements made by Sardar Santokh Singh the Investigating Officer, Gajadhar Prasad the Vakil who had paid the money in the first instance to Parmeshar Dial, and Parmeshar Dial who paid the money over to Mathura Prasad, Gaya Prasad, siaha nawis of the estate, Budhu Lal who swears to the deposit of Rs. 115-7-0 in the treasury of the estate on the 12th of September 1916, and Inspector Piare Nath Bannerji who investigated the present case. Nothing further of any importance so far as the prosecution is concerned was elicited from these witnesses. The Joint Magistrate considered that a prima facie case had been made out against Mathura Prasad and called upon him for an explanation. He says that he took these moneys to the treasurer on the 16th of October 1915 and the treasurer told him that Babu Gaya Prasad, who apparently is the manager of this endowed estate, had given verbal orders that no money of Mauza Chilonda should be deposited. He goes on to say that he deposited the money in the custody of the treasurer Murli Dhar. In this matter he is supported by the evidence of Murli Dhar that the money was returned to him in January or February 1916 and that he finally deposited the money on the 12th of September 1916. He gives certain reasons for not having deposited the money between the 21st of May, 1915 and 16th of October 1915, namely, that he had to get in the revenue, and that in July 1915 his brother became very ill, and was again ill in April 1916 and died on the 5th of June 1916. I may at once say that in this part of the case I agree with the learned Joint Magistrate that the explanation given of the delay between the 21st of May 1915 and the 16th of October 1915 is very flimsy. But the first question in every criminal case is is the Court satisfied that the prosecution have placed beyond reasonable doubt the offence with which they have charged the accused, what the prosecution in the present case say is sufficient to establish an offence under section 408, Indian Penal Code, is that the accused being a servant was entrusted with this Rs. 115-7-0 and that he retained the money in his possession for more than a year. No evidence has been put forward pointing to a distinct act or acts of criminal breach of trust in respect of this money. In fact it was contended on behalf of the prosecution that there was no necessity for the prosecution to prove the actual mode of criminal breach of trust or criminal misappropriation, and in support of this contention they put forward the case of Emperor v. Kadir Baksh (1). The case, however, put forward differs in one very marked respect from the case before me. Kadir Baksh was a peon entrusted with summonses to witnesses and with diet money per witness. He returned the summonses unserved but not the money. Now the course of procedure for peons entrusted with the serving of summonses is laid down by definite rules which are well-known. There is a rule definitely saying that a peon of this kind returning summonses unserved must deposit with a nazir the money which he received for this purpose and which has not been paid out. The learned Judges who decided the case of Emperor v. Kadir Baksh (1) rely in their judgment upon the provisions of section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act. It is true that a Court may presume the existence of a fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct, and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case. Its terms are very wide and as regards private business one cannot omit from consideration what is known to be too often the practice regarding moneys received on account of a private firm. In the present case the estate is a private estate. No attempt has been made on the part of the prosecution to prove that any rule of the estate, or any contract, express or implied, lay between the estate and Mathura Prasad regarding the time and the manner in which all such moneys were to be deposited. It is easy to say that they should be deposited without delay, but that must be a matter of proof as much as any other matter of fact in the case. Retention of moneys for fifteen months after receipt undoubtedly raises a very serious doubt of bona fides against an accused, but the mere retention is not conclusive proof of criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust. In the present case it is alleged that there were moneys due to Mathura Prasad, and there is evidence that something like Rs. 300 had been paid to him at any rate one month before the deposit of this Rs. 115 to re-pay the moneys due. This matter should have been more worked out by the prosecution, and it ought to have been shown how long these moneys had been due to him. Unfortunately there is nothing on the record to show whether these debts due to him were of long standing or merely of yesterday. The accused from the very first opened his hand and said "I was paying the money in within four months, but the treasury refused to take it on the ground that it had received orders from the manager not to receive moneys of the Chilonda Estate." The prosecution knew what they had exactly to prove, that the witnesses whom they put forward should depose to the procedure in this private estate regarding the time when moneys had to be deposited. They could without any difficulty have sent for the manager Gaya Prasad and put him into the witness-box and definitely ascertained whether he admitted or denied such orders having been issued. It is quite within the bonds of possibility that if Gaya Prasad were sent for now and examined as a witness in the case, he might on oath affirm that there were such orders in existence and why they had been issued. There is nothing on the record on which beyond probability a Court should infer that no such orders had ever been given and that there were no reasons for issuing such orders. Again, there was more than one opportunity in which the prosecution might have asked the witnesses produced by them on these points which must have been well known. But no such question was asked. It is a matter of experience which cannot be overlooked that procedure regarding deposit of moneys and dealing with moneys in private firms is often very lax and loose. Of course whether Gaya Prasad's evidence was to be believed could only be arrived at when his evidence were on the record and was open to consideration. He was not sent for in the present case, and it is contended that it was not for the prosecution to produce him but it was for the accused to have called him in defence. I have carefully considered this point. Looking to the present case where there is no evidence before me that the accused disposed of this money or attempted to dispose of it in some way other than that in which he was bound to do, the burden, in my opinion, still rested upon the prosecution to place before the Court beyond reasonable doubt that the evidence was sufficient to be conclusive proof that criminal breach of trust had been committed. As I said at the beginning of this judgment, the prosecution relied upon the bare retention which has been challenged by the defence, the latter having given a certain amount of evidence to show that the retention was not for sixteen months as alleged by the prosecution, coupled with the weakness of the explanation given by the accused. I think there is room for doubt, and the accused must be given the benefit of that doubt. I accordingly set aside the conviction and sentence. The fine, if paid, will be refunded. The bail-bond is discharged.

(1) 8 Ind. Cas. 687; 8 A. L. J. 88; 33 A. 249; 11 Cr. L. J. 699.

MEWA SINGH v. EMPEROR.

Conviction set aside.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 457—Burglary—Accused found along with others in possession of stolen property—Benefit of doubt.

The accused was charged with an offence under section 457, Indian Penal Code. The evidence showed that two burglaries were committed in village B., that tracks of four men were followed from a place near the village, but later on they changed into the tracks of a mare and two men. A short distance further on the mare's tracks went off in one direction and the men's tracks were followed to village D., when the accused was arrested along with certain others in possession of certain bundles which were found to contain the stolen property:

Held, that the mere fact that the accused was with the party in village D. did not prove that he was one of the burglars and that the case against him being doubtful he was entitled to an acquittal. [p. 306, col. 2.]

Appeal from the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Sialkot (at Gujranwala), dated the 17th February 1917, convicting the appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This judgment will cover the connected appeal of Juman (Criminal Appeal No. 382 of 1917) who with Mewa Singh has been convicted in this case under section 457. By reason of previous convictions, Juman has been sentenced to ten years' rigorous imprisonment and Police surveillance after release. Mewa has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment as it is his first conviction.

The evidence clearly proves that two burglaries were committed one night in

MEWA SINGH v. EMPEROR.

Bhond village, and jewelry was stolen from one house and clothes, ghee, etc., from the other. The tracking party followed the tracks of four men from a place near the village where some half eaten melons and an earthen pot were lying. Later on the tracks altered to the tracks of a mare and two men. Later on the mare's tracks went off in one direction, and the party followed the foot tracks to Dhoda village, where some men were found seated in a garden, with some bundles. The tracking party, having got assistance, captured Buta Singh and Sardara, and (according to the evidence) Mewa Singh also, and Hari Singh went off to the thina and brought back the Police, but before the Police arrived Mewa Singh had escaped. In the bundles the Police found property which was identified as part of that stolen in the burglaries.

Buta Singh and Sardara were tried and convicted. Now Juman and Mewa Singh have been also tried and convicted, and both have appealed.

Juman was not found in the garden by the tracking party, but there is ample evidence that he had been in Dhoda village that morning. If he and Mewa Singh as well as Buta Singh and Sardara were all concerned in the burglaries, then it must have been their tracks which were traced from near Bhond village. But here I find a difficulty which the learned Sessions Judge seems to have overlooked. After a time the thieves got hold of a mare. Whether a fifth man brought the mare, or whether the mare had been left tethered somewhere is not clear, but the evidence of Kesar, Sansi (see page 75), is that when the party passed him there were four men, two riding, one of whom was Buta Singh, and two walking, one of whom was Juman. So apparently no fifth person had joined the party. Later on the mare leaves the party, and the trackers now follow the footsteps of three men into Dhoda village (see the evidence of Kheru, page 50 of the Session's record). So it appears that one of the four thieves went off elsewhere with the mare, and we have no evidence on the record, as far as I can discover, to show that the fourth man ever entered Dhoda village. So we must not assume that of a party of four men in Dhoda all four were thieves.

As regards Mewa Singh, the learned Sessions Judge has made a slip in saying that Kesar says he recognized Mewa Singh. Kesar says he recognized Buta Singh and Juman, but not the other two. Hari Singh says Kesar also named Mewa Singh, but this appears to be a bit of embroidery on Hari Singh's part.

There is plenty of evidence to show that Mewa Singh was with Juman, Sardara and Buta Singh in Dhoda village, but the only witness who swears to having seen him with the others at any other place is Roda, P. W. No. 8, who lives a mile from Bhond, and says that the evening before the burglary Juman, Buta Singh and two others came to his well. He says it was one watch after nightfall, and it was a dark night, but he professes to recognize Mewa Singh as one of the other two, though he had never seen him before. This is not at all convincing. As I have pointed out, one of the four thieves went off with the mare, and so there is no proof that more than three of the four entered Dhoda village. So the mere fact that Mewa was with the party in Dhoda is no proof that he was one of the burglars. He may have joined the other three in Dhoda village. No doubt he was caught in the garden, and was named in the first report. But of the three men caught he alone escaped before the Police arrived, and I fancy the Dhoda men procured his escape because they knew he was innocent. Had the Dhoda men really interfered in force they could presumably have secured the escape of Buta Singh and Sardara as well.

I think the case as against Mewa Singh extremely doubtful and I shall accept his appeal.

As to Juman there is, I consider, ample evidence that he was with the thieves both on the way to Dhoda village and also in the village, though he was lucky enough or shrewd enough not to be caught with the others in the garden. The defence evidence is worthless. I shall dismiss his appeal.

The appeal of Mewa Singh I accept and reversing conviction and sentence I acquit him and order him to be released.

Appeal accepted.

The issuing of a notice by the Board under the provisions of section 186 of the U. P. Municipalities Act is not a condition precedent to the institution of a prosecution under section 185. [p. 308, col. 2.]

In a case in which a person allows a sanction by the Municipal Board to erect a building to lapse and then proceeds to set up the building without giving fresh notice or submitting any fresh application to the Municipal Board, a prosecution for an offence against the Act is a more appropriate remedy than an order for the demolition of the building. [p. 308, cols. 1 & 2.]

A tin-roofed shed erected in front of a shop is a "shed" and also a "roofed structure" within the meaning of the definition of the word "building" in section 2, clause (2), of the Municipalities Act. [p. 308, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal by the Local Government against the acquittal order of the Special Magistrate, 2nd class, Lalitpur, dated the 14th of December 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. E. Ryves (Government Advocate), for the Crown.—Notice under section 186 of the U. P. Municipalities Act is not a condition precedent to a prosecution under section 185 of the Act. The powers conferred on the Board by these two sections are not interdependent. It is just possible that a building may be quite unobjectionable and still it may contravene the provisions of section 185. If the view of the Magistrate is upheld it is tantamount to holding that a Municipal Board cannot prosecute for a seemingly clear breach of the law without first giving a notice to demolish a building which may otherwise be unobjectionable. In this case the Board had given sanction for the erection of the shed in question but that sanction was allowed to lapse. The erection was made after one year without notice or any fresh application to the Board.

Mr. Sital Prasad Ghose, for the Opposite Party, supported the judgment of the Magistrate and contended that the erection of a tin shed did not come within the definition of "building." A tin shed erected in front of a shop was a merely temporary shelter and not a permanent shed or roofed structure.

Mr. E. Ryves was not called upon to reply.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal which the Local Government have felt it their duty in the public interests to file against the order of a Special Magistrate sitting at Lalitpur, who has acquitted one Mulla Hashim Ali on a prosecution alleging against him an offence under section 185 of the Municipalities Act (Local Act II of 1916). The allegation against Hashim Ali was that he had erected a tin roofed shed in front of a certain shop, of which he was the tenant, within the limits of the Municipality of Lalitpur and that he had done this without obtaining the sanction of the Board. The case was defended upon various grounds in the Court below. It was suggested that as a matter of fact sanction had been obtained by one Chaube Chaturbhuj, the owner of the house. We have found it necessary to look into the evidence on this point. We think it is clear that on the 30th of July 1915, the Municipal Board of Lalitpur passed a resolution which had the effect of conveying to Chaube Chaturbhuj their sanction to the erection of a shed of this description on the locality in question. Under the Municipalities Act itself, as well as under the bye-laws, such a sanction would remain in force for one year. The case for the prosecution is that the building in question was erected after the expiration of one year. The accused endeavoured to prove that the erection had actually been commenced and completed on the 27th of July 1916, or just within one year. It has been necessary for us to examine the evidence on this point, but we agree with the learned Magistrate that the defence evidence is unreliable. The statement of the conservancy darogha is corroborated by one of his own subordinates and by the fact that he actually reported the construction of this building on the 6th of August 1916. It may be taken as a satisfactory proof that the shed had in fact been erected on the 5th of August 1916. It was also suggested in the Court below, as well as here, that the construction in question was not a "building" within the definition contained in section 2, clause (2) of the aforesaid Act. We think there can be no doubt that it was a "shed" and also a "roofed structure," within the meaning of that section. As a matter of fact Chaube Chatarbhuj had applied for sanction as already stated, but the sanction had lapsed. So far everything we have said is in agreement with the view taken by the learned Magistrate. The reason why the trial in that Court ended in an acquittal is that the learned Magistrate felt himself troubled by a curious question of law. He refers to the provisions of section 186 of the Municipalities Act, according to which the Board "may at any time," in a case like the present, by issuing a written notice, require any person in the position of Hashim Ali to demolish a building set up by him without the sanction of the Board, or in contravention of the terms of such sanction granted to him. The learned Magistrate has taken the view that, by reason of these provisions, it was absolutely necessary for the Municipal Board to issue a notice requiring Hashim Ali to demolish this building before they prosecuted him for having erected it. There is really nothing in the terms of sections 185 and 186 of the Municipalities Act to support this view. The powers conferred on the Board by these two sections are intended to be used in the alternative, according as the necessities of a particular case may require. A building may be quite unobjectionable in its nature and yet its erection without the previous sanction of the Board may be an offence against the law. To hold that a Municipal Board cannot vindicate its authority against such a breach of the law, without first ordering the demolition of an otherwise unobjectionable building, is to place a forced and illiberal construction on the Statute and would lead to consequences not desirable in the public interests. In the present case, for instance, the Municipal Board had shown that it was ready to sanction the erection of a shed on the locality in question, and had actually granted sanction for the purpose, but there had been a contravention of the law on the part of Hashim Ali, in that he had allowed that sanction to lapse and then proceeded to set up this shed without giving fresh notice or submitting any fresh application to the Municipal Board. In such circumstances as this, a prosecution for an offence against the act was a more appropriate remedy than an order for the demolition of the building. We are quite satisfied that the issuing of a notice by the Board under the provisions of section 186 of the Municipalities Act is not a condition precedent to the institution of a prosecution under section 185. The reason given by the learned Magistrate, therefore, for acquitting the accused in this case is unsatisfactory and his view of the law mistaken. We must set aside the order of acquittal, and in lieu thereof we record the conviction of Mulla Hashim Ali for an offence under section 185 of the United Provinces Municipalities Act. We think that under the circumstance it would be quite sufficient for us to sentence him to pay a fine of Rs. 5 (rupees five) and we order accordingly.

Order set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145, scope of—Order of ejectment, whether competent—Magistrate, whether can decide claims to hold possession and reap crops—Irregularity—Jurisdiction—Revision—High Court, power of interference of.

The scope of section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code is merely a determination of actual possession for the purpose of preventing a breach of the peace pending a decision on the merits in a civil dispute. [p. 309, col. 2.]

The section does not provide for eviction by the Magistrate or for a decision by him of any claims to a right to hold possession or to reap crops. [p. 309, col. 2.]

Clause (1) of section 145 is imperative with regard to the necessity of serving an order in writing on the parties. The mere omission to record such an order gives the Chief Court power to interfere in revision. [p. 309, col. 2; p. 310, col. 1.]

Where the proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code are irregular and the Magistrate has acted without jurisdiction, the Chief Court can interfere in revision. [p. 310, col. 2.]

KAKU & HARNAMAN.

Where the lands in question were attached to a dera and there being two rival claimants to the mahantship, each claiming to be in possession through his tenants, the Magistrate passed an order directing the men of one of the parties to leave at once and not to re-enter or interfere with the crops under penalty of a prosecution under section 188, Indian Penal Code:

Held, that the order was bad inasmuch as the Magistrate had neglected to come to any clear finding on the one point on which a decision was really necessary, the date of forcible possession, and had passed orders for which the section gave no authority whatever. [p. 310, col. 1.]

It is not sufficient for a Magistrate to come to a general finding that certain fields are in the possession of one party and certain others in the possession of the other and that the latter has taken wrongful and forcible possession. The date of such forcible possession must be determined and unless there is a finding that the forcible possession occurred in the case of all the fields at the same time, there must be a finding as to the date of possession with regard to each field separately. [p. 310, col. 1.]

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This judgment will cover the connected Revisions Nos. 1852 and 1853 of 1916.

In the first place I note that one of the respondents Sawan Singh has not been served, and has left the country on active service. He was, however, only holding a part of the land as a tenant at-will, and his tenancy having now terminated it is unnecessary to consider him as a party.

These cases arise out of proceedings which purport to be under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code.

The lands in question are attached to a dera in village Rayan. The late mahant died in May 1915, and Hari Das and Biram Das are rival claimants to the mahantship. As the Magistrate relates in his order of 31st August 1916, since the rabi of 1916 there has been trouble, one set of men claiming to be in possession as tenants of Hari Das and another lot claiming to hold as tenants of Biram Das. The order of 3rd August 1916 deals with claims to standing crops, holding that claims by Biram Das's tenants to crops are untenable except those of Daya Singh, Attar Singh and Partap Singh who are to get the crop of certain fields. By a later order dated 27th September 1916, the Magistrate deals with the question of possession. Apparently the Magistrate found some fields in possession of one party and some in possession of the other. The Magistrate says: "These cases should really be split up into the number of claimants for each separate piece of land, but this process would have taken a little time." So the Magistrate treats the case as a whole, and decides it in favour of Hari Das's followers, saying, "it is obvious that Biram Das's men, wherever they have gained actual possession, have done so by force." So the Magistrate passes an order that Biram Das's men are to leave the fields at once and on no pretence to re-enter or interfere with the crops under penalty of prosecution under section 188, Indian Penal Code.

The Magistrate seems to me to have lost sight of the scope of the provisions of section 145, which briefly may be said to be merely a determination of actual possession for the purposes of preventing a breach of the peace pending a decision on the merits of the civil dispute.

The section first requires an order in writing by the Magistrate (see clause 1), which must be served on the parties (see clause 3). Then the Magistrate is required, without reference to the merits of the rival claims, to decide which party was in possession at the date of the above order, though if he finds a party was forcibly and wrongfully dispossessed within two months next before such date he may treat the party so dispossessed as in possession at such date (see clause 4). Having so decided the Magistrate is to issue an order declaring such party to be entitled to possession until evicted in due course of law, and forbidding all disturbance of such possession until such eviction.

Nowhere does the section provide for eviction by the Magistrate, or for decision by him of any claims to a right to hold possession or to reap crops.

In these cases no written order was ever passed under section 145 (1), though clause (1) is imperative on this point. I should not, however, have thought it necessary to interfere on this ground alone, had I found that this was the only flaw in the proceedings, though I consider that the mere omission to record such an order gives me the power to interfere. But here I find that the Magistrate has neglected to come to any clear finding on the one point on which a decision is really required, and has instead passed orders for which the section gives no authority whatever. In such a case it is not sufficient to come to a general finding that certain fields are in possession of one party and certain fields in possession of the other and that the latter has taken wrongful and forcible possession. The date of such forcible possession must be determined, and unless there is a finding that the forcible possession occurred in the case of all the fields at the same time, there must be a finding as to date of possession with regard to each field separately. For the possession as regards one field might date back to more than two months prior to institution of these proceedings, while the reverse might be the case with regard to another field. Nowhere does the section provide for eviction. So even if there had been a proper written order passed as required by clause 1, and had the Magistrate found that Biram Das's men had taken forcible possession within two months of that order, all that he could have done would be to pass an order declaring Hari Das's men to be entitled to possession, and forbidding disturbance of possession of Hari Das's men. The section does not provide for ejecting the party wrongfully in possession and for putting in the party who is declared to be entitled to possession.

KAKU V. HARNAMAN.

Nor does the section make any provision for the decision of any dispute as to standing crops [see Arju Mea v. Arman Mea (1).] All that the Magistrate has to do is to look to the fact of possession. He cannot usurp the functions of the Civil Courts, and determine any claims on the merits.

So the Magistrate has erred both in passing an order for possession, and also in passing an order as to who is entitled to crops.

(1) 7 C. L. J. 369; 7 Cr. L. J. 336.

The first necessary thing is to pass a written order, as required by clause (1). This gives a date on which to work. The next thing to do is to peruse the written statements, and take evidence as required by clause 4. The parties must be given due opportunity of producing evidence and all evidence produced must be recorded. This may in some cases involve time and trouble, but the provisions of the law are imperative. It appears to me that though the Magistrate has in this case taken a good deal of trouble, spending three evenings on the spot, he has taken a wrong view of the procedure required. In one place he writes: "It was imperative that one party should be turned off the land immediately to save further and more serious trouble." Later on he writes: "In the present cases I have not thought it necessary to make any lengthy enquiry, as very recently the whole matter has been enquired into in detail." As I have already said, section 145 does not provide for turning any body off from the land. And as to the matter of saving "further and more serious trouble", the remedy in such cases is provided for by the second proviso to clause 4, which authorizes the Magistrate to attach the subject of dispute pending his decision.

For the respondents it is urged that this Court has no power at all to interfere with orders passed or purporting to be passed under section 145, and that even a High Court can only do so under its Charter powers [see Udai Bhan Partab Singh v. Ram Samajh (2) and Jhingai Singh v. Ram Partap (3)]. On this point the High Courts are not all agreed, but I prefer to follow the view which this Court has always taken, i.e., that where the proceedings are irregular and the Magistrate has acted without jurisdiction, this Court can interfere on revision.

I accept these applications for revision and set aside the orders of the Magistrate. This, of course, leaves it open to the Magistrate to take fresh proceedings if it should still be thought advisable to do so. It is to be hoped that if fresh proceedings are taken,

JUDGMENT.—We think that the convicting Magistrate's order directing the forfeiture of certain gold rings found on a water stand in this house cannot be supported under the Act and must be set aside.

The second paragraph of section 8 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act, 1887, clearly refers back to clause (c) of section 6, and the articles liable to seizure and forfeiture are limited to articles of value reasonably suspected to have been used or intended to have been used for the purposes of gaming and found within the premises. Here there is no evidence on the record to suggest the conclusion that the gold finger rings were used or intended to be used for the purpose of gaming. Indeed such evidence as there is points to another conclusion.

Messrs. Satya Chandra Mukerji and Jang Bahadur Lal, for the Applicants.

Mr R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The five applicants have been convicted of the offence of rioting by a Magistrate who sentenced them to terms of rigorous imprisonment and fines. On appeal the learned Sessions Judge maintained the convictions but set aside the sentences of imprisonment and replaced them by sentences of fines only. The applicants urge before this Court that on the findings of fact at which both the Courts below have arrived, they were not guilty of the offence of rioting, but they acted, as they all along pleaded that they did act, in the exercise of the right of private defence and they had no time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities. The facts are simple. Jageshar Rai lawfully and legally obtained possession of certain land and he sowed on it certain crops, rabi of 1915-16. and commenced to cut the crops for the purpose of removing them or at least damaging them. Information of this was sent to Jageshar Rai, and he in company with a band of men went straight to the spot to protect his property. A fight resulted in which, however, very slight damage was done to anybody. It was on these facts that the learned Judge has upheld the conviction of rioting. It is clear to my mind that under the circumstances of this case the convictions cannot be maintained. The very circumstances show that the applicants had no time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities. The learned Sessions Judge suggests that they had plenty of time to go on to the Police Station and to make a report of theft. It is true that they had ample time to do that, but that would have been of very little use so far as the protection of the property was concerned. The damage and loss would have been completed before the Police could have arrived. The case cannot for a moment be compared to the reported case of Queen-Empress v. Prag Dat (1) and the other cases which are mentioned in that judgment. Furthermore, it is not a case in which the opposite party were merely ploughing up the land and preparing it for sowing. In the latter case no damage is being done, and there is ample time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities for the enforcement of their right. In the present case, property was actually being cut and damaged. If the applicants had gone to the Police Station and returned with Police help the damage would have been completed. They clearly did not use any more violence than was absolutely necessary for the protection of the property. I, therefore, accept the application, set aside the convictions and sentences and direct that the fines, if paid, be refunded.

Held, that the offences being more than three and being neither of the same kind, nor committed in the course of the same transaction, there was a misjoinder of charges in contravention of the provisions of sections 234 and 235, Criminal Procedure Code, and that consequently the proceedings were illegal and should be quashed. Application for revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Sukkur.

Mr. Lalchand Hassomal, for the Applicants.

Mr. E. Raymond (Public Prosecutor for Sind), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

PRATT, J. C.—The accused has been tried for four offences in regard to the service of summons on two occasions on one Bungul the defendant, against whom he had filed a suit in the Court of Sub-Judge, Rohri.

The first summons was alleged to have been served on the 21st October 1914, and the charge against the accused was that he had abetted some unknown person to fix a false thumb impression purporting to be Bungul's and thereby committed an offence of abetment of forgery under sections 465 and 109; and that he swore a false affidavit in regard to the service and thereby committed an offence under section 193, Indian Penal Code. The second summons was served on the 22nd January 1915 and in respect of that service the prosecution alleged that the accused had committed abetment of forgery on that day and that subsequently on the 30th March 1915, he swore a false affidavit as to its service.

The Sessions Judge has acquitted the accused in respect of the two offences in regard to the summons of October 1914, but has convicted the accused in regard to the two offences of forgery and false evidence in respect of the summons served in January 1915.

The first objection raised by Mr. Lalchand in this application is that the trial is bad as there has been a misjoinder of charges in contravention of the provisions of section 234, Criminal Procedure Code. We think this objection must prevail. Under section 234 offences of the same kind up to three in number committed in the course of twelve months can be charged in the same trial. But the offences of forgery and giving false evidence are not offences of the same kind and the number is more than three so that joinder of these offences in one trial is not justified by that section.

The Public Prosecutor refers to section 235, Criminal Procedure Code, and contends that all the four offences were part of the same transaction or that even if the offences in regard to the two summonses be regarded as two separate transactions, yet the joinder of charges for those separate transactions is good under section 234.

We think it quite clear, however, that section 234 refers to offences and not transactions. It does not provide that all offences committed in a year in three different transactions may be tried in one trial. We agree on this point with the decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Kasi Viswanathan v. Emperor (1).

Then as to the other ground of the Public Prosecutor's argument, can it be said that these four offences all formed part of the same transaction? This is really a question of fact which was considered at some length in the case of Emperor v. Ghulam (2). The tests stated in that case were proximity of time and continuity of purpose and action. There was a considerable interval of time, an interval of no less than three months, between the service of the two summonses. Nor do we think it can be said that the act attributed to the accused in regard to the service of the second summons is in any way a continuation of the acts which he is alleged to have committed in regard to the service of the first summons. The false service and the false affidavit alleged in regard to the first summons seems to us to be a transaction complete in itself. If the suit had not failed for want of prosecution, no further action on the part of the accused in regard to service would have been necessary. It was only when the case was struck off that it became necessary for the accused to embark on a similar line of conduct. This line of conduct is similar to that which he had adopted in regard to the first service of the summons but it cannot be said to be a continuation of it, for the first summons had been accepted as served and there was nothing further left to be done in regard to it.

We would also refer to the case of Queen-Empress v. Fakirapa (3), where it was said that the expression "same transaction" is not applicable to cases in which the offences are separated by distinct intervals of time or place and which must be proved by distinct evidence.

We are unable, therefore, to accept the contention that these four offences were committed in the course of the same transaction and can be joined at one trial under section 235, Criminal Procedure Code. That being so, the trial must be quashed for under the ruling of the Privy Council in the case of Subrahmaniam Ayyar v. King-Emperor (4) any such defect amounts to more than an irregularity.

It only remains for consideration whether the case is one in which we should direct a new trial. Under the circumstances of the case we do not think it necessary to adopt this course. The fact that the accused pointed out Bungul to the bailiff on the second occasion rests solely on the testimony of the bailiff himself. Then again as to the affidavit of the 30th, there are many discrepancies between the facts stated in the affidavit of the 30th March and the actual facts of the service on the 27th of January. It has been suggested that these discrepancies are due to mistakes made by the deponent, but if the deponent had a guilty intention he would have been overcautious to make his deposition agree with the facts.

We accordingly reverse the conviction and sentence and make no order as to trial.

HAYWARD, A. J. C.—I concur. There were more than three offences dealt with at the trial, namely, the four offences of abetment of forgery and false evidence in respect of the summons of October and again of abetment of forgery and false evidence in respect of the summons of January. On this account also the trial could not be justified under the provisions of section 234, Criminal Procedure Code. There does not appear to be any authority for holding that the word "offences" used in that section was intended to include groups of offences forming part of the same transactions. The trial could not, therefore, in that view be justified either under section 235, Criminal Procedure Code, nor does there seem sufficient ground for holding that the four offences formed part of one single transaction. Whether they did or not is a question of fact and that question in these particular circumstances ought, in my opinion, to be decided in the negative. The trial could not, therefore, in any view of the case be justified under section 235, Criminal Procedure Code. The result must, therefore, be that the conviction must be set aside. There is the less regret for this conclusion as upon the merits there would not appear to me to be a particularly strong case. The only evidence in respect of the offence of abetment of forgery was that of the bailiff, and in respect of the offence of false evidence the evidence of the bailiff did not agree in material points with the statements in the suspected affidavit of the accused. There would appear to me, therefore, to be no sufficient ground for ordering a re trial under the discretion vested in us under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Conviction set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 54 (1), 537—Arrest without warrant—Arrest without notifying substance of warrant—Omission, effect of—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 147, 149, 333.

The omission to notify the person arrested of the order for his arrest is an irregularity covered by section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 315, col. 2.]

The writing out of a warrant or an order for arrest when the person to be arrested comes within the first clause of section 54 of the Criminal Procedure Code, is a superfluous act but cannot be considered illegal. [p. 315, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 14th July 1916.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Appellants.

Mr. L. M. Banerji (Government Pleader), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is presented by nine persons who have been convicted of offences under section 147 and section 333 read with section 149, Indian Penal Code; for the offence of riot, they have each of them been sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment, and for the offence under section 333 read with section 149, Indian Penal Code, they have been sentenced each of them to two years' rigorous imprisonment. The sentences are by the order to run concurrently. The facts found by the learned Sessions Judge with the concurrence of the assessors are as follows:—Two persons Raj Man and Bisheshar for whose arrest warrants were out were arrested by the Police and were on their way to the Police Station. Saran, one of the convict appellants, raised an alarm to the effect that his sons were being removed by the Police and called for a rescue party. Some 50 people more or less assembled armed with lathis and surrounded the Police. Under Saran's directions an assault was committed upon the Police, a party consisting of a naib darogha, constables and chowkidars. Raj Man and Bisheshar got released. They also began to use lathis. The learned Judge says that there is no doubt about the identification of the nine accused before him as persons who took part in this riot and rescue. The Police received a number of injuries and one constable received grievous hurt as his thumb was broken. A good deal of time was taken up in arguing the question whether the arrest in the present case was a legal or illegal arrest. It was contended that it was an illegal arrest, inasmuch as (1) the warrants or orders for arrest were illegal, (2) the substance of the warrants or orders was not notified to the persons arrested before they were arrested or at the time of their arrest, (3) that in consequence of these irregularities the Police cannot be held to have been assaulted while in execution of their duty as Police Officers. None of these pleas appear to me to be entitled to weight. The orders for arrest have been read over to me. They were within the power of the officer who gave them. He was not, it is true, an officer in charge of the Police Station, but he was an officer superior in rank and had the same powers as the officer in charge of the Police Station. In the present case one may go further and question whether there was any necessity for any order. The persons arrested came within the first clause of section 54, Criminal Procedure Code, and they might have been arrested without an order from the Magistrate and without a warrant. The writing out of a warrant or an order for arrest was a superfluous act, and because it was a superfluous act, it cannot be considered to be illegal. Some argument was addressed to me to the effect that the prosecution had not proved that the injury to Ram Lachman Singh was an injury caused at the time of the assault upon the Police and in furtherance of the common object of the unlawful assembly, which was the rescue of the two men Raj Man and Bisheshar. So far as I know, and no evidence to the contrary has been read to me, there was no separate assault other than the assault which I have set out as committed upon the Police. It was a fair inference for the learned Sessions Judge to draw in the absence of such evidence that the injury was caused in the scuffle which then took place. If the intention of the defence was to make an interval of time and to raise a doubt whether the injury might not have been caused before such interval or after such interval, they should have drawn attention to the fact in cross-examination. I have heard no cross-examination pointing to that result.

There is a plea taken to the effect that the order for arrest was not shown to Raj Man and Bisheshar which in the course of the argument whittled down to the plea that the substance of the order was not notified to those two men. Even if it were not notified, I am not prepared to hold that that was an omission which could not be covered by section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I looked and asked when this point was first raised in order to arrive at a decision I was referred to nothing earlier than the Sessions trial. I examined, however, the statements made by the accused before the Committing Magistrate, and in none of those statements did I find any question raised on this point.

The pleas 5, 6, and 7 were not directly argued before me, and no particular stress was laid upon them.

There was a plea that section 333, Indian Penal Code, has no application and that the offence came under section 334, Indian Penal Code. Section 334 is in no way applicable. There was no grave and sudden provocation within the meaning of that expression.

Now comes the question of sentence. What are the facts? A village of Ahirs, and the Ahirs deliberately attacked a large body of Police who were carrying out their duty as public servants. It was a grave offence upon the law, and I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that it called for sentence. Possibly the sentence might have been altered with advantage in the direction of strong security for keeping the peace; but that was not done, and I leave that alone. I take the sentences as they stand, and I think they are not one whit too severe under the circumstances of the case. The appeals are dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

A High Court has jurisdiction to interfere on revision with an acquittal, but it should exercise this jurisdiction sparingly, and only where it is urgently demanded in the interests of public justice. [p. 316, col. 2.]

Faujdar Thakur v. Kasi Choudhuri, 27 Ind. Cas. 186; 42 C. 612; 19 C. W. N. 184; 21 C. L. J. 53; 16 Cr. L. J. 122, relied upon.

By a long established practice of the Bombay High Court, revisional applications against orders of acquittal are not entertained from private petitioners except on some very broad ground of the exceptional requirements of public justice. [p. 316, col. 2.]

Criminal application for revision from an order of acquittal passed by the Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, in Case No. 47815 of 1916.

Mr. Setalvad, for the Appellants.

Mr. Jinnah, for the Opponents.

JUDGMENT.

BATCHELOR, J.—The present petitioners have applied to this Court in revision against an order made by the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate acquitting the opponents, who in the Magistrate's Court had been charged by the petitioners with infringement of the petitioners' copyright in certain calendars under section 7 of the Copyright Act, III of 1914. The sole ground upon which the learned Magistrate has acquitted the opponents is that there was no copyright in the calendars in question, because these calendars had not been registered under Act XX of 1847. It is contended by Mr. Setalvad that that view of the learned Magistrate was erroneous in law. For the purpose of the present argument I will assume that the learned Counsel's position upon this point is indisputable. Upon that assumption we have still to consider whether this Court in the proper exercise of its discretion ought to interfere with this order of acquittal.

Under the law the sole power of appealing against acquittals is vested in the Government.

Substantially this petition does not materially differ from a petition of appeal against an acquittal. By the long established practice of this Court revisional applications against orders of acquittal are not entertained from private petitioners, except it be on some very broad ground of the exceptional requirements of public justice. This rule of practice rests on public grounds of great importance, and so far as can be discovered, has never been departed from by this Court except in two isolated cases; both those cases were cases where the applicant in revision was not a private individual but a Municipality, i.e., a public body, so that the Court cannot be said to have broken in upon the principle of discouraging attempts by private persons to obtain the reversal of orders of acquittal. The whole question of the High Court's interference in revision with orders of acquittal was recently considered by the Calcutta High Court in Faujdar Thakur v. Kasi Choudhuri (1), where the practice of all the High Courts was passed in review by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J. There was a difference of opinion between the two Judges who at first heard the application, but ultimately Sir Lawrence Jenkins's view prevailed. The learned Chief Justice, after considering the history of the decisions upon this point, concluded by saying:—

"As I have already indicated, I am not prepared to say the Court has no jurisdiction to interfere on revision with an acquittal, but I hold it should ordinarily exercise this jurisdiction sparingly, and only where it is urgently demanded in the interests of public justice. This view does not leave an aggrieved complainant without remedy: it would always be open to him to move the Government to appeal under section 417, and this appears to me the course that should be followed."

I am of opinion that this pronouncement of the Chief Justice should be followed, as correctly interpreting both the provisions of the law and the established practice of this Court. In the case before us if this principle is to be applied, it is clear that the petition must be rejected, for there is no matter of general public importance involved,

“Structure”, meaning of—Fixing portable plank over

The word “structure”, as used in section 209 of the U. P. Municipalities Act, means a structure of a permanent character. Therefore, the fixing of a portable plank over a public drain cannot be deemed to be the erection of a structure within the meaning of that section, and does not amount to an offence under section 210 of the Act.

Kamta Nath v. Municipal Board of Allahabad, 28 A. 199; A. W. N. (1905) 252; 2 A. L. J. 676; 2 Cr. L. J. 793, followed.

Criminal reference made by the Sessions Judge, Saharanpur, dated the 19th January 1917.

JUDGMENT.—Muhammad Yusuf, the accused in this case, and Janki Das, the accused in the connected case No. 106 of 1917, have been convicted under section 210 of Act II of 1916, the United Provinces Municipalities Act, and each of them has been sentenced to a small fine. The two cases have been submitted by the learned Sessions Judge with the recommendation that the convictions and sentences should be set aside. Muhammad Yusuf and Janki Das own shops abutting on a public road within the Municipal limits of Dehra Dun. There is a drain in front of their shops which was apparently built at their expense. The drain is at the edge of the public road. Culverts have been built over the drain but the present dispute does not relate to the culverts. The charge against Muhammad Yusuf was that he had placed wooden planks in front of his shop supporting them by the culverts on one side and at in canister on the other. Janki Das was prosecuted for putting planks over the space between two culverts, so as to cover the drain.

The learned Sessions Judge finds “in both cases the erections, if they can be so denominated, are temporary ones. Neither the planks nor Muhammad Yusuf’s canister are fixtures; all are placed in sites in the mornings and removed when the shops are closed in the evenings. Presumably they can be and are also removed if and when it is desired to clean the drain, if it is necessary to remove them in order to perform this operation.” Section 210 of the United Provinces Municipalities Act provides that any person erecting or re-erecting any such projection or structure as is referred to in section 209 without the permission thereby required or in contravention of any permission given thereunder shall be liable on conviction to a fine which may extend to two hundred and fifty rupees. Clause (b) of sub-section (1) to section 209, which is the clause applicable to the present case, refers “to the erection or re-erection of any projection or structure so as to overhang, project into, or encroach on or over a drain in a street.” There is no question of projection in this case. The question is whether the accused had “erected” any structure encroaching over a drain in a street. The learned Sessions Judge is of opinion that a structure referred to in section 209 must mean a structure of a permanent nature. It seems to me that the view taken by the learned Judge is right. The use of the words “erect or re-erect” which precede the word “structure” indicates a structure of a permanent nature. The word “structure” is not defined in the Act, but the use of the word “erect” shows, as was observed in the case of Kamta Nath v. Municipal Board of Allahabad (1), that what was meant was something of the nature of a permanent structure. It does not seem to me that in enacting section 209 the Legislature intended to place any other meaning on the word “erect” than that held in the case to which I have referred. In this view the fixing of a portable plank cannot be deemed to be the erection of a structure within the meaning of section 209 of the Act. The conviction of the accused was, therefore, in my opinion, illegal. I accordingly set it aside and direct that the fine imposed on the accused, if paid, be refunded.

Conviction quashed.

It is for the High Court, exercising its jurisdiction under section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code to transfer a case from one Court to another, to satisfy itself that on the facts disclosed there is a reasonable apprehension that the accused may be prejudiced and not have a fair trial. A quarrel or unpleasantness between the Judge and the Counsel for the accused is no ground for the transfer of a case under section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 319, col. 1.]

It is for the Judge, when he sees that a Counsel is harassing or browbeating a witness unduly or trying to suppress his answers, to intervene and protect the witness in the interest of justice. [p. 321, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—This is an application for the transfer of this case from the Court of the Sessions Judge of Gaya to some other Sessions Court within the Province.

The accused has been charged with offences under sections 161 and 165 of the Indian Penal Code. The charge is in respect of receiving illegal gratification. In the first instance the accused was proceeded against at Ranchi. He formerly occupied the position of Superintendent of the Office of the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals for Bihar and Orissa. At Ranchi, the proceedings advanced up to a certain stage. An application was then made to this Court for a transfer of the case from Ranchi to some other Court. Eventually the matter came up before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Sharfuddin, with the result that an order was made transferring the case, more or less by consent, to the Court of the Sessions Judge of Gaya.

On the 10th of April, the learned Sessions Judge of Gaya had full seisin of the hearing of this case. The accused was represented by various leading legal gentlemen, but more particularly by the distinguished Advocate of this Court, Sir Ali Imam. On the 10th of April, it is alleged now for the first time, a remark was made by the Judge to Sir Ali Imam which caused some little unpleasantness; but inasmuch as this matter has not directly or indirectly been referred to in the petition before us, we will disregard it entirely from our consideration. Matters proceeded and the learned Judge, in order to meet the request of the professional gentlemen on behalf of the accused, made a certain order that inasmuch as he would take evidence in respect of illegal gratification received by the accused outside the three charges that were preferred against him, Counsel for accused should have the opportunity of cross-examining witnesses three days after the examination-in-chief of each witness had concluded, in order that the legal advisers of the accused might not be inconvenienced and have ample time to prepare materials for cross-examination; and as far as this arrangement was concerned the learned Judge appears to have treated the accused and his Counsel with every consideration possible.

On the 16th April the cross-examination of Panna Lal by Sir Ali Imam commenced and at this stage an incident, which is much to be regretted, took place. The cross-examination continued for two whole days, and Sir Ali Imam endeavoured in the course of the cross-examination to get from this witness from whom his instructions were received with regard to the procuring of certain confidential reports. The witness claimed privilege and the learned Sessions Judge ruled that the witness was entitled to claim privilege and that he should not be called upon to answer the questions that were then being put to him. Whereupon Sir Ali Imam is alleged to have said: "I will get it yet;" and the learned Judge seems to suggest in his note that thereafter Counsel set himself to extract from the witness in an indirect way answers to the questions for which privilege had been allowed by the learned Judge. The learned Judge styled the conduct of Sir Ali Imam in so doing as "improper". I think that the learned Judge used the word "improper" in a wrong sense; and I do not think that the learned Judge could have intended to convey any personal insult to the learned Counsel or that his conduct was in any sense morally improper. I think, however, that Judges should have great regard for the high position they occupy and to the fact that they are the administrators of law and justice; and they should be very careful not to make wrong use of words or to offer discourtesy or insult to the professional gentlemen who appear before them. But in my opinion while the obligation on the part of the Judge towards the legal profession is great, the obligations imposed on Counsel in their conduct towards the Bench is of equal importance. Counsel are members of an honourable profession and should recognize their responsibility and their duties towards the Court and to the public, and should endeavour by their conduct to prevent on all occasions unpleasantness; and should not by word or gesture provoke the Court or the Judge to offer discourtesy. If the Judge rules that a certain question should not be asked, a reasonable man actuated by a high sense of professional dignity ought to follow that ruling and act accordingly. If Counsel thinks that the ruling of the Judge is wrong, he has a remedy for having the Judge set right and no attempt should be made which would be calculated to mislead or to provoke unpleasantness between the Judge and Counsel. Nobody regards more sincerely than I do the obligation which should guide the Court in its conduct towards the legal gentlemen who appear before it; and nobody has higher regard for the rights and traditions of the legal profession than I have; but it would be wrong to encourage the idea or create the impression that a quarrel or unpleasantness between Judge and Counsel should be allowed to form the basis for an application for transfer. If a quarrel is provoked then the responsibility is upon those who do provoke the quarrel. As I have indicated above, the learned Judge wrongly used the word "improper" in regard to the conduct of Sir Ali Imam. Sir Ali Imam is a distinguished member of the legal profession of 27 years' standing and I cannot think that the learned Judge could have intended to convey that Sir Ali Imam was guilty of improper conduct in the strict technical sense. Nobody who knows Sir Ali Imam would suggest that he would be consciously guilty of conduct likely to provoke the displeasure of the Court. There has been in this case an unfortunate misunderstanding between the Judge and Counsel and I think no more. All that we are concerned with in this application, however, is to see whether in this case there is any indication upon which we could hold as reasonable men that the accused will not get a fair trial at the hands of Mr. Foster. And we are also to consider in that aspect of the case whether a transfer should reasonably be given; and whether if the accused is further tried by Mr. Foster the accused will be prejudiced. Mr. Hassan Imam in concluding his address said that he felt sure that if the accused was further tried by Mr. Foster he would not get a fair or impartial trial. What we have to ascertain is whether there is any foundation or reasonable cause for this assertion. This Court must be satisfied itself that if a transfer is not granted the prisoner may be prejudiced, and not have a fair and impartial trial. In my opinion the law on this subject laid down by the Calcutta High Court is far too wide in its general terms, vide the cases reported as Dupeyron v. Driver (1), Legal Remembrancer v. Bhairab Chandra Chuckerbutty (2) and Kali Charan Ghose v. Emperor (3). These cases seem to suggest that the right to a transfer is to be governed by what the accused thinks are his prospects of securing a fair trial, and not as to whether prejudice exists or not in the mind of the Trial Court. I cannot follow that line of reasoning. It is for the High Court exercising its jurisdiction to transfer to satisfy itself that on the facts disclosed there is a reasonable apprehension that the accused may be prejudiced and not have a fair trial. This was the law laid down by Mr. Justice Knox, in a case reported as Juggan v. Emperor (4), after a full and exhaustive review of all the authorities and certainly it appears to be consonant with the general principles of law and the meaning and spirit of section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Otherwise the discretion of the High Court would be fettered and controlled by the opinion of the accused.

Mr. Foster made certain observations, whereupon Sir Ali Imam thought it incumbent on him to withdraw from the case and as Sir Ali Imam was leaving Court, Mr. Foster said: "If you take my rulings in a personal manner your absence will afford me great relief." It may have been rather indiscreet language to have made use of; but I do not think that the learned Judge intended to convey a personal insult to Sir Ali Imam; but certainly to my mind it does not afford reasonable ground for transferring the case. Sir Ali Imam withdrew; but the accused had representing him, besides Sir Ali Imam, three Barristers and two Vakils, every one of whom also withdrew. I think the attitude and conduct of these gentlemen amounted to gross injustice towards their client. There had been no insult offered to the Bar in general in any way by the learned Judge. If the Bar as a whole had been insulted they would have been entitled to withdraw as a protest against the Judge's conduct. But the incidents narrated in this matter were between the Judge and Sir Ali Imam, and had nothing whatever to do with the profession as a whole. Therefore, I think that the other gentlemen who appeared for the accused were bound to safeguard the interests of their client; and that they committed a serious breach of duty in leaving their client in a helpless condition without legal assistance. The unfortunate incident between the Judge and Sir Ali Imam appears to have taken place in the morning at 8 o'clock and was all over within 20 minutes. There is on the record a note by the learned Judge of everything that took place from day to day—a very full and ample record. The accused filed a petition on the 18th, asking that the case might be postponed for a week to enable him to engage fresh legal advisers for his defence; and it is noteworthy that nowhere in the petition filed on the 18th, nor in the two petitions filed on the 19th, is there any suggestion that the accused was being unfairly treated by the learned Judge. On the contrary, if the record of the 18th is correct the accused admitted that he had been fairly treated. After Counsel had withdrawn, the accused put in a petition for the postponement of the case on the sole ground that his legal advisers having deserted him he would be obliged to engage and instruct other gentlemen. The Judge at first allowed an hour's time—that of course was not sufficient—to engage and instruct Counsel. The learned Judge recognised this and granted further time for a day, or rather 22 hours—from 11 o'clock on the 18th to 9 o'clock the following morning. On the following morning the accused again appeared without any Legal Advisers and filed a petition praying for a further postponement for three days. Mr Foster said, 'I can't give you three days' time—I have witnesses here who are public servants and come from various districts and who have been kept here for their cross-examination for more than three days—I cannot delay the case further—my order is final.' However, after further consideration the learned Judge gave the accused another day in the hope that he would be able to engage some Vakil or Counsel, of whom there are several in Gaya, to defend him. The next day when the learned Judge proceeded to take up the case he received a telegram from Mr. Hasan Imam—Mr. Hasan Imam refers to the reference in the Judge's record to the receipt of this telegram and says that the manner in which the learned Judge has recorded its receipt by him was intended to be a personal insult to him. I certainly think no such inference could be drawn from the entry in the Judge's record. The suggestion appears wholly without foundation. Mr. Hassan Imam's motive in sending the telegram could only have been to relieve Mr. Foster of considerable embarrassment and to warn the District Judge against taking any steps calculated to prejudice the accused. Upon receipt of Mr. Hassan Imam's telegram the learned Judge wired to the Registrar (or to the District Magistrate) to ascertain what the exact position was; and by the post arrived Mr. Coutt's letter informing him that this Court had been pleased to let notice issue to show cause why this case should not be transferred from the file of the District Judge of Gaya to the file of some other Court.

In the petition for transfer it is stated that the learned Judge should have granted the petitioner an adjournment for seven days, because under the circumstances it was justifiable to enable him to secure new legal advisers; and that the learned Judge's refusal to give an adjournment clearly showed that the Judge was prejudiced towards the accused and that he could not expect justice at his hands. This argument seems to be untenable. To countenance it would be to reduce the administration of justice to a farce. In this connection it is right to observe that it was not the learned Judge who was unfair to the accused, but his own legal advisers who wholly abandoned him without any plea or justification. The Judge was bound to proceed with the case after a reasonable opportunity was afforded to the accused to secure legal assistance; such opportunity was given to the accused but he failed to avail himself of it, though he was on bail and free to secure the services of some of the many legal practitioners in Gaya.

A further ground for asking for a transfer is that the learned Sessions Judge interfered unnecessarily in the cross-examination of a certain witness by the accused's Counsel, and thus showed himself not to be impartial.

Now, it is for the Judge, when he sees that a Counsel is harassing or browbeating a witness unduly, or trying to suppress his answers, to intervene and protect the witness in the interest of justice. In this case the learned Judge says that he had to intervene because he thought that the witness was being unduly harassed and treated with unfairness. I have known of many worse quarrels than this between Judge and Counsel, but I have never known of a case where the fact of an altercation between the Bench and Counsel was put forward as a ground for a transfer.

I do not think that, merely because there has been this unfortunate misunderstanding between the Judge and Counsel, we should, in the exercise of our discretion, transfer this case. If we do so we might be creating an impression that every little misunderstanding, whether provoked or unprovoked, between Judge and Counsel would be a sufficient ground for transfer, although there would be no ground for a reasonable apprehension that the accused would be prejudiced. In this case I am convinced that no prejudice against the accused exists in the mind of the learned Judge; and I am satisfied that the accused has not got a reasonable apprehension that he will not receive at the hands of Mr. Foster a fair or impartial trial.

One more matter is of importance and it is referred to incidentally in the petition. Sir Ali Imam is alleged to have called Panna Lal a liar three times. Sir Ali Imam, through the petitioner, says that he merely put it to the witness that a certain statement made by the witness was false. The learned Judge, in the daily record of the proceedings, seems to have put a wrong construction upon the question put to the witness by Sir Ali Imam; and he seems to think that the Counsel called the witness a liar three times when he gave Sir Ali Imam a hostile answer to a question put. If, as the learned Judge says, it was a fact that the Counsel called the witness a liar it would be clearly the duty of the Court to intervene; but we are inclined to think that the learned Judge was wrong in putting that interpretation on Sir Ali Imam's observation. It would, in our opinion, be very regrettable to think that a gentleman of the legal profession of Sir Ali Imam's standing would call a witness in open Court a liar; and we decline to accept the statement that Sir Ali Imam called the witness Panna Lal a liar. We think that what Sir Ali Imam did say was, "I put it to you that the statement made by you is untrue, that is, is not true, that it is false." However, although we think that the unfortunate incident which took place between Sir Ali Imam and Mr. Foster is much to be regretted, we cannot say that the learned Judge has done anything which would lead us in any way to hold that he has rendered himself incapable to proceed with the trial of this case and to discharge his duties fairly or impartially. Therefore, we feel that we must refuse this application.

CHAPMAN, J.—I agree. I desire to add one or two words upon the two points on which the application for transfer is based. In respect of the first ground, which concerns the unfortunate incident which arose from a question asked by Sir Ali Imam for the purpose of obtaining from the witness information in respect of which the District Judge had previously allowed privilege, I have this to say: that while there was reason for the District Judge to complain of the question it would have been better if he had simply disallowed it. He should not have accused Sir Ali Imam of impropriety of conduct. Again, when he saw that strong feeling had been aroused, the learned Judge was indiscreet in utilising that occasion for finding fault with the manner in which the witness had been cross-examined by Sir Ali Imam on the previous day. In my opinion the Courts in this country should be more careful to show courtesy to Counsel who appear before them than Courts elsewhere. The Courts have not had experience at the Bar and do not know the difficulties under which Counsel labour in conducting their cases and how often faults are due merely to the earnestness of the Advocate in the interest of his client. I have noticed an occasional tendency in the Courts in this Province to be too ready to attribute impropriety of motive to Counsel. They sometimes fail to appreciate that an Advocate may be led in the heat of contest to indulge in conduct which he would not indulge in but for his zeal to safeguard the interests of his client. In any event judicial proceedings are better controlled by the exercise of dignity than by intemperance. So far as the refusal of the application for time is concerned, I find it impossible to say that the refusal indicates any bias in the mind of the Judge. It might have been better if the Judge had, as suggested, allowed two days time at once, inasmuch as in the end the Judge was able to adjourn the trial for that period. But it is clear that there were special reasons for refusing to adjourn the case for too long a period. In the first place there were several public servants summoned as witnesses from various districts who had been detained in Gaya for cross-examination at the request of the Counsel for the accused, and in the second place the Sessions Judge's calendar was full. In these circumstances the learned Judge felt bound to refuse to adjourn the trial. Apart from the incident with Sir Ali Imam the record shows that the learned Judge throughout showed special consideration to the interests of the accused. I am unable to hold that there was any ground for a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that he was likely to be prejudiced by reason of a bias in the mind of the Judge.

In these circumstances I agree that the application for transfer should be rejected.

Application rejected.

Calcutta Municipal Act (III B.C. of 1899), s. 561—Bye-laws framed under Act, Nos. 83, 85, interpretation of—Persons guilty of breach of bye-law, whether punishable separately.

Per Curiam, (Teunon, J., dissenting.)—The breach of a bye-law of the Calcutta Corporation by several persons acting in concert is punishable under the Calcutta Municipal Act as a single offence, the individual offenders not being punishable separately. [p. 325, col. 1; p. 327, col. 2.]

The joint proprietors of a theatre are "a person" for the purposes of Bye-law No. 85 of the Calcutta Corporation, framed under the Calcutta Municipal Act. Therefore for a breach of the bye-law the proprietors are not liable to be fined separately or more than Rs. 20 in all. [p. 325, col. 1; p. 327, col. 2.]

When a theatrical performance is continued later than 1 A. M. in violation of bye law No. 83 of the Calcutta Corporation, the Calcutta Municipal Act provides a punishment for the offence and not for the individual offenders. [p. 325, col. 1; p. 327, col. 2.]

AMRITA LAL BOSE V. CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

Per Chitty, J.—The provisions of the Indian Penal Code have no direct bearing on the question of the interpretation of a bye-law of the Calcutta Corporation. [p. 328, col. 1.]

It will be ultra vires of the Calcutta Corporation to frame a bye-law under the Municipal Act providing separate punishments for offenders jointly implicated in a breach of the bye-law. [p. 327, col. 2; p. 328, col. 1.]

Per Teunon, J.—Under section 561 of the Calcutta Municipal Act a breach of a bye-law framed by the Calcutta Corporation makes the persons jointly guilty of the breach separately liable to be punished with a fine of Rs. 20 each. [p. 324, col. 1.]

FACTS of the case appear from the following judgments of Teunon and Chaudhuri, JJ.—

TEUNON, J.—In this case the three petitioners are the co-sharer owners, and managers of a theatre known as the Star Theatre situate in Cornwallis Street in the town of Calcutta.

On the night of 3rd September 1916 the performance at this theatre was continued beyond the hour 1 A. M., the closing hour fixed by the bye-laws framed by the Corporation under section 559, sub-section 52, of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899. The petitioners have, therefore, been convicted of a breach of one of the aforesaid bye-laws, namely, the 83rd and under the 85th bye-law they have been sentenced, the first petitioner to pay a fine of Rs. 20 and the 2nd and 3rd petitioner each to pay a fine of Rs. 10.

It is not disputed, on the contrary it is admitted, that the petitioners acting in concert committed the breach complained of, but on their behalf it is urged that under section 561 of the Act the breach of a bye-law is an offence single (or joint and indivisible) in its nature, and that there can, therefore, be but one penalty, a fine not exceeding Rs. 20. In other words, it is contended that in so far as Bye-law No. 85 says that every person guilty of a breach may be punished with fine which may extend to Rs. 20, it has gone beyond section 561, which provides that it is the breach of a bye-law that is or may be punishable with a fine of that amount and to that extent, therefore, the bye-law is ultra vires.

In support of this contention the case of Rex v. Clark (1), decided by Lord Mansfield in 1777, has been cited. In the course of the argument we have also been referred to the case of Crepps v. Durden (2), which seems to have no bearing on the question now at issue and also the case of Reg. v. Dean (3) and Reg. v. Little-child (4).

Now in each of these cases it is to be observed that the joint offenders were severally punished, and the observations of the learned Judges touching offences in which, however many the persons concerned, only one penalty attaches, must be regarded as largely in the nature of obiter dicta.

Two earlier cases, King v. Bleasdale (5) and Hardyman v. Whitaker (6), the latter cited in Rex v. Clark (1), appear to have been decided on the special wording of the Statute 12 Ann. c. 14, section 4. I

Whether the distinction drawn or attempted to be drawn in Rex v. Clark (1) between offences single in their nature and offences several in their nature continues at the present time to be recognised in English Law may be said, I think, to be doubtful.

But, whatever the law in England, no Indian authority in support of the contention advanced on behalf of the petitioners has been cited before us, and to any mind it is fairly clear that neither the distinction referred to nor collective penalties have been recognized in Indian penal legislation.

In support of this view I should refer to the definition of the word "offence" in section 40 of the Indian Penal Code. The 2nd clause of that section makes the subsequent sections (109, 110, 112 and 114—117) regarding abetment applicable to things punishable under special or local laws; section 109 then provides that each conspirator shall be punished with the punishment provided for the offence committed in pursuance of the conspiracy.

I should next refer to the Bengal General Caluses Act, I of 1899, which, for instance, applies sections 64 and 67 of the Indian

AMRITA LAL BOSE v. CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

Penal Code to fines imposed under bye-laws made under the Calcutta Municipal Act, III of 1899.

For these reasons and on general principles I hold that when in section 561 of the Calcutta Municipal Act it is said that a breach of a bye-law may be made punishable with fine which may extend to twenty rupees, what is provided is that the persons guilty of the breach, and in the case of breaches jointly committed each offender, may be punished to that extent.

A secondary argument was that by virtue of the definition of the word "persons" to be found in the Bengal General Clauses Act, section 3, sub-section (32), the three petitioners being joint proprietors of the theatre in question are to be regarded as one person for the purpose of the bye-law. But the definition applies only when there is no repugnancy in the subject or context. In the view I take three offenders cannot be punished as one, and fine and imprisonment are not to be apportioned.

Lastly, I observe that my learned colleague has suggested that the facts have not been sufficiently investigated, but this is to go outside the scope of the Rule and beyond any suggestion made or argument advanced either at the time when the application was presented or when the Rule came on for hearing. The petitioners having pleaded guilty, further investigation of facts became unnecessary, and there has been no suggestion that the theatre was kept open otherwise than as the result of combination and agreement between all three.

In the foregoing reasons, I am of opinion that the bye-law in question is not ultra vires and the petitioners have been properly convicted and sentenced.

In this view this Rule should be discharged.

CHAUDHURI, J.—This Rule was issued at the instance of three petitioners calling upon the Municipal Magistrate and the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation, to show cause why the fine imposed upon them should not be reduced to a sum not exceeding Rs. 20 in all. They are the proprietors of a theatre known as the "Star Theatre" and have been convicted and sentenced by the Municipal Magistrate under clauses 83 and 85 of the bye-laws framed under section 559 (52) of the Calcutta Municipal Act, Act III B. C. of 1899, for having on the 3rd September 1915 continued the performance at the theatre later than 1 A. M. The petitioner Amritlal Bose has been fined Rs. 20 and Hari Charan Bose and Dasu Charan Neogy, the other two petitioners, Rs. 10 each. The question before us is whether separate fines exceeding Rs. 20 in all can be imposed. The Magistrate in his explanation says, that it has not been shown that the Star Theatre is a limited liability company, that the petitioners may be partners, but do not constitute a "person" in the eye of the law. He does not think that the definition of 'persons' in the General Clauses Act X of 1897 is strictly applicable to the Calcutta Municipal Act and the bye laws thereunder. He has, however, overlooked that the Bengal General Clauses Act—Act I of 1899—applies, section 3, sub-section (32), of which defines "person" thus: "'Person' shall include any company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not." If the petitioners constitute a partnership, incorporated or not, it comes within the definition. Bye-law No. 85 runs as follows:— "Every person guilty of a breach of any of these bye laws (referring to the bye-laws relating to theatre) shall be punishable with fine which may extend to Rs. 20." I do not think that the three petitioners can be separately punished with fine exceeding Rs. 20 in all for a breach of bye-law No. 83, which prohibits performance later than 1 A.M. Section 559 of Act III of 1899, sub-section (52), empowers the General Committee of the Municipality to make bye-laws for the regulation of theatres. Section 561 provides that in making a bye-law under section 559 the General Committee may provide that a breach of it shall be punishable with fine which may extend to Rs. 20. The penalty is, therefore, limited to Rs. 20 only. No doubt Bye-law No. 85 says "every person guilty of a breach shall be punishable." The Statute makes the breach punishable. I do not think that the limit which has been imposed by the Statute can be exceeded by any bye-law. The Magistrate explains that Bye-law No. 85 says: "Every person shall be punishable and not every offence is to be punished."

AMRITA LAL BOSE v. CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

He has referred to the case of Reg. v. Dean (3), and says that he has followed that ruling in awarding the above punishment. It is to be noticed that the case referred to was one under section 44 of the Smuggling Prosecution Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 53, which clearly makes different persons liable. Baron Alderson points out that it is necessary to look at the Statute to see whether it was intended that every person offending should be punished. Here clearly the Statute provides that the breach shall be punishable and the bye-law thereunder must be interpreted in that light. No bye-law can extend the meaning or effect of the present Statute. Here the penalty under the Statute refers to the offence. Crimes undoubtedly are several, but an offence of this character can rarely be said to be several. The "person" who is guilty of the offence are the proprietors of the theatre, not the partners individually. If each partner were held liable for the breach, the larger the number of proprietors the greater would be the penalty. I do not think it was ever intended that the fine was to be imposed in this way, a limit having been placed as to the amount by the Statute itself. In Rex v. Clark (1) Lord Mansfield enunciates the principle thus: "Where the offence is in its nature single, and cannot be severed, there the penalty shall be only single; because though several persons may join in committing it, it still constitutes but one offence." Rex v. Clark (1) was treated as good law in Reg. v. Littlechild (4), in which Hannen, J., quoted with approval the following rule from Paley on Convictions 5th edition 262, (6th edition, page 275): "If either the penalty be imposed by the Act upon each person convicted, even where the offence would in its own nature be single, or if the quality of the offence be such that the guilt of one person may be distinct from that of the others, in either of these cases the penalties are several." Here the Act has not imposed several penalties, and it does not seem to me that keeping the theatre open is such an offence that the guilt of one proprietor can be considered distinct from the guilt of the others. They collectively are a "person". Crepps v. Durdan (2) was cited at the Bar to show that such an offence is not divisible in point of time. It relates to Sunday sales which are prohibited by 29 Car. 2, c. 7, and it was held that different sales by the same person on a Sunday are not punishable as separate offences but as one offence. A breach of Bye-law No. 85 is under the Bengal General Clauses Act, Act I of 1899, section 3, sub-section (30), an "offence" which is defined as "any act or omission made punishable by any law for the time being in force". The punishment for the offence is provided in the Municipal Act, and also in the bye-law thereunder. Section 26 of the Bengal General Clauses Act provides that sections 63 to 70 of the Indian Penal Code and the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code relating to the issue of processes for the levy of fines apply to all fines imposed under any Bengal Act or any rule or bye-law thereunder, unless the latter contains an express provision to the contrary. Beyond that we need not go to the Penal Code. In this case we need not consider the question as to whether "abettors" as defined in the Penal Code can be held liable. The Magistrate says that the petitioners are "also managers in three different capacities of the theatre in question". There is nothing to show what part each took in the management of the theatre. It is not shown what each of them did in respect of the performance on the 3rd September. They have been separately fined, merely as proprietors. No individual default has been proved or attempted to be proved against them. They apparently admitted they were proprietors and pleaded guilty that the theatre was kept open after 1 A. M. Beyond that nothing has been proved against them. I am not prepared to give the bye-law an extended application and hold that individual members of the audience who were present on that occasion, the actors, the orchestra and the menial staff of the theatre, all who aided the performance, are liable to a fine of Rs. 20 each, under Bye-law No. 85. Take for instance Bye-law No. 84, which says that the manager shall not allow any person in a state of intoxication to enter a theatre. Bye-law No. 85 equally applies to its breach, but by the introduction of the abetment sections in the Penal Code, various other persons may be held liable. It seems to me fairly clear that it was not so intended but as I have said, it is unnecessary to deal with that question in this case. In the case of penalties we cannot adopt an oppressive interpretation. Several bye-laws have been framed under the Municipal Act for the regulation of theatres and section 85 collectively deals with penalties for their breach. The language used in it does not seem to me to be happy.

The Magistrate has referred to some earlier cases in which separate fines were imposed upon the petitioners, to which apparently they did not object. I notice that in all these cases the aggregate amount of fine imposed did not in any instance exceed Rs. 20. Those cases have no value at all in considering the question before us.

In view of what I have said, I would make the Rule absolute, and direct that the fine in excess of Rs. 20, if paid, be refunded.

The Judges being equally divided in opinion, the case was under section 429, Criminal Procedure Code, laid before Mr. Justice Chitty.

Mr. Norton (with him Babu Hemendra Nath Sen), for the Petitioners.—Section 559, subsection 52, of the Calcutta Municipal Act empowers the Corporation to frame certain bye-laws for the regulation of theatres, etc. Section 561 of the same Act makes the breach of a bye-law punishable with fine. The petitioners are here charged with the breach of Bye-law No. 83 and the punishment for that breach is stated in Bye-law No. 85. The punishment is a fine of Rs. 20. It is the offence clearly and not the offender, whether one or more, that is made punishable by section 561 of the Act. Bye-law No. 83 says that every person guilty of a breach of any of the bye-laws shall be punished with fine, etc. It is wrong to hold in the circumstances of the present case that each and every one of the three petitioners is liable to a fine of Rs. 20 each. The three persons here are to be regarded as one person. Awarding of fine exceeding Rs. 20, as it has been done here by sentencing the petitioners to pay fines of Rs. 40, is ultra vires because the provisions of section 561 are clear. Here the offence is one and indivisible, it is a non-separable offence and so the punishment will be Rs. 20 only on the petitioners as one person. The offence cannot be severed, Rex v. Clark (1) Crepps v. Durden (2), Reg. v. Dean (3) and Reg. v. Showdar Ghenar (7). The intention of the Statute is that every offence is to be punished and not every offender.

The petitioners are joint proprietors of the theatre and as such they constitute one person as contemplated by the Bengal General Clauses Act, 1899. Section 64 of the Indian Penal Code has no reference to the case in point.

Mr. Langford James (with him Babu Manmathanath Mookerjee), for the Corporation.—The wording of the Statute is clear and it is this,—Every person guilty of a breach of any of these bye-laws shall be punishable, etc., vide Bye-law No. 85. So as a logical corollary, each of the three petitioners is liable to pay the fines inflicted on them. To say that they constitute one person is to stretch the meaning. Moreover, it has not been proved that there three form a limited liability company; each one of them is entrusted with different functions. The bye-law contemplates punishing the offender for the breach, viz., continuing the theatre beyond 1 A. M. The cases cited by Mr. Norton do not lay down any proposition as to whether the offence here is inseparable and single or can be severed, and the remarks made there are in the nature of obiter dicta and so they must not guide your Lordships. Indian penal legislation does not recognise any distinction between single or several offences and the other side has not cited any Indian authority. Refers to section 40 of the Indian Penal Code and section 26 of Act I of 1899. Bye-law No. 85 says that every person shall be punishable and not every offence is to be punished.

JUDGMENT.—In this case a Rule was issued at the instance of the three petitioners Amritalal Bose, Hari Prasad Bose and Dasu Charan Neogi, calling on the Municipal Magistrate and the Chairman of the Corporation to show cause why the sentences imposed on the three petitioners should not be modified and reduced to a sum not exceeding Rs. 20 in all. The grounds were (1) that Bye-law No. 85 does not empower the Magistrate to impose a fine of more than Rs. 20 for a breach thereof, and (2) that the petitioners being joint partners and owners of the Star Theatre were a "person" within the meaning of Bye-law No. 85 and thus not liable to be fined separately or more than Rs. 20 in all. The learned Judges who heard the Rule having differed in opinion, the case has been laid before me for my opinion under section 429, Criminal Procedure Code. The three petitioners are the joint proprietors of the Star Theatre in Cornwallis Street. On the night of 3rd September 1916, the performance at that theatre was continued beyond 1 A. M. The three petitioners were summoned for having committed a breach of Bye-law No. 83 and the second petitioner appeared and admitted the offence. The Municipal Magistrate thereupon fined the three petitioners Rs. 20, Rs. 10 and Rs. 10 respectively. The only question is whether the imposition of such penalties was authorised by law.

Section 559 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899, provides that the General Committee may make bye-laws, (inter alia), (52) for the regulation of theatres and other places of public resort, recreation or amusement.

By section 561, in making a bye-law under section 559, the General Committee may provide that a breach of it shall be punishable (a) with fine which may extend to twenty rupees, and, in case of a continuing breach, with fine which may extend to ten rupees for every day during which the breach continues after conviction for the first breach.

By bye-laws made under section 559, for the regulation of theatres, etc., it was provided, (inter alia), (83) no performance shall be continued later than 1 A. M. unless with the special permission of the Chairman for any particular occasion, and (85) every person guilty of a breach of any of these bye-laws shall be punishable (a) with a fine which may extend to twenty rupees, etc., (following the words of section 561 above quoted).

In Paley on Summary Convictions, 6th edition, at page 275, the law is thus stated: "Though several offenders may be (as it seems) included in one conviction for offences jointly committed, it depends upon the wording of the particular Statutes applicable to each case and the quality of the offence, whether each person be liable to a distinct penalty or all collectively to but one." The determination of the question, therefore, depends upon the interpretation to be put upon the particular Statute, in this case the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899. In Rex v. Clark (1) Lord Mansfield thus enunciated the proposition: "Where the offence is in its nature single, and cannot be severed, there the penalty shall be only single, because though several persons may join in committing it, it still constitutes but one offence; but where the offence is in its nature several, and where every person concerned may be separately guilty of it, there each offender is separately liable to the penalty; because the crime of each is distinct from the offence of the others and each is punishable for his own crime." I am unable to agree that because in that case the offence was found to be in its nature several, this is a mere obiter dictum. It lays down in clear and unmistakable terms the test to be applied. So, too, the remarks of Alderson, B., in Reg. v. Dean (3): "We must look at the Statute to see whether it was intended that every person offending should be punished, or merely that every offence should be punished. The question is, whether an offence which is committed by several persons is to be visited by one penalty or each person is to be visited by a penalty." In the case before me I am clearly of opinion that the offence is single in its nature and that the Calcutta Municipal Act provides a punishment for the offence, and not for the individual offenders. The words "a breach (of a bye-law) shall be punishable" can only mean that. Nor can it have been intended that the penalty to be imposed, i. e., Rs. 20 or Rs. 10 per diem, for a continuing breach, should be indefinitely multiplied in proportion to the number of persons jointly committing such breach.

If it be argued that such an intention is indicated by the use of the words: "Every person" in Bye-law No. 85, and if that was the only possible interpretation to be put upon them, I should be inclined to hold that the bye-law was to that extent ultra vires. But I do not so read it. The word "person" by the definition in the Bengal Clauses Act, 1899, includes "any company, or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not." It would, therefore, include the three petitioners as joint proprietors of this theatre and they may properly be regarded as a "person" for the purposes of Bye-law No. 85.

In my opinion the provisions of the Indian Penal Code have no direct bearing on the present question, which is one of the interpretation of the particular Statute. No doubt some of the provisions of that Code are made applicable by the Bengal General Clauses Act, 1899, and in other ways to offences under special and local laws, such as the present. But we are not now concerned with, say, the question of abetment of the breach of a bye-law, and I am not prepared to say that a person might not be charged with such an abetment. The question of intention would then crop up, which finds no place in cases of the breach of many of the bye-laws.

So far as section 64 of the Indian Penal Code is concerned, it has been pointed out that it could not be enforced in case of such a breach of a bye law as that which we are now considering [see Basanta Kumari Devi v. Corporation of Calcutta (8)].

So far as I am aware, the principles laid down in the various English cases for the interpretation of the Statutes, to ascertain whether the offence be single or several in its nature, have not been changed in recent years. In the case of Reg. v. Showdar Ghenar (7), the question came before a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court. There Westropp, C. J., in an exhaustive judgment reviewed all the English cases, and the Court applying the same test to the Statute then before them (Regulation XXI of 1827, section 4) held that the several accused could only be liable for the one penalty. This case, which does not appear to have been cited to the Bench who heard the Rule, shows that in Bombay at least the old English decisions were accepted as sound law in 1870.

I agree, therefore, with Chaudhuri, J., in (8) 11 Ind. Dec. 142; 15 C. W. N. 906.

holding that the Rule must be made absolute. The conviction of the three petitioners will be upheld but the penalty imposed upon them will be one of Rs. 20 only, to be apportioned equally between them. Any excess over Rs. 20, if paid, to be refunded.

Rule made absolute.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS APPLICATION NO. 69
OF 1917.

May 4, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Piggott and Mr. Justice Walsh.

HANSRAJ SINGH—APPLICANT

BHAGWANA—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 476, 195—Prosecution of complainant—Sanction, form of—Court, duty of.

Where the prosecution of a complainant is justifiable in the general public interest, it should be carefully guarded against becoming a means of oppression or revenge in the hands of individuals. [p. 329, col. 2.]

Therefore, under such circumstances an order under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, is more appropriate than an order for sanction under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 329, col. 2; p. 330, col. 2.]

Per Walsh, J.—The absence of an authority whose duty it is to decide upon and undertake prosecutions under section 211 is a flaw in the criminal procedure in this country. [p. 329, col. 2.]

There is no higher duty laid upon a Court of Law than that of strict enforcement of a strict adherence to truth. [p. 330, col. 1.]

Per Piggott, J.—Where one of two Judges constituting a Bench is clearly of opinion that the case under consideration is a proper one for the institution of further proceedings, it would be improper for his colleague to refuse to concur. [p. 330, cols. 1 & 2.]

Criminal miscellaneous application for sanction to prosecute the opposite party under section 194, Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Sital Prasad Ghosh, for the Applicant.

Mr. G. W. Dillon, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

WALSH, J.—I think this case demands further enquiry and the better plan is to send it to the District Magistrate of Allahabad as "the nearest Magistrate" and on our own initiation under section 526, Criminal Procedure Code, to transfer it thence to the District Magistrate of Meerut to institute proceedings against (1) Musammatt Bharto under section 211, Indian Penal Code, for having, in the first report made on 15th October 1916 at the Police Station, Begamabad, laid a false charge against Hansraj Singh for the murder of Ganga Bakhsh, knowing the said charge to be false, (2) Musammatt Bharto and Nanhua for having on the same date conspired to make such false charge and having conspired to support it by evidence which they knew to be false, (3) Musammatt Bharto for offences under section 194, Indian Penal Code, at the Court of Session, Meerut, on the 3rd of January 1917 in Trial No. 105 by falsely swearing, (a) "I met the choukidar on the road by the village. He was sitting there a little way from the village. I told him to accompany me". (b) "The choukidar did not go to see the body". (c) "I do not know Balle Mukhia. I do not know any Balwant. I did not go out of the house. I did not go to Balle's house and did not see Balle that day." (d) "We (i.e., Ganga Bakhsh and Musammatt Bharto) had bullocks when he was called a month before (he was killed), two bullocks and a buffalo. My father-in-law had the cane sown after ploughing with his own bullocks. The field had been ploughed three or four days before my father-in-law was killed;" (4) Nankua Jat for offences under section 194, Indian Penal Code, at the time and place mentioned in paragraph (3) in respect of the following statements: (a) "I heard Hansraj giving abuse to Ganga Bakhsh. I saw them two 150 yards away. Hansraj began to say to Ganga Bakhsh, 'Betichod, I told you last night to plough. Hoshyar, beat berchod.' Hoshyar then hit Ganga Bakhsh with a lathi on the head. Ganga Bakhsh fell." (b) "Hansraj kept saying the same thing over and over again. 'Why are you ploughing when I forbade you last night,' Hansa told Hoshyar to beat the betichod as he had forbidden him the night before to plough the field." (5) Bhagwana for offences under section 194, Indian Penal Code, at the time and place mentioned in paragraph (3) in respect of the following statements: (a) "Hansraj was giving gali to Ganga Bakhsh. I saw them two 150 yards away. Hansraj began to say to Ganga Bakhsh, 'Betichod, I told you last night not to plough. Hoshyar, beat the berchod.' Hoshyar then hit Ganga Bakhsh with a lathi on the head. Ganga Bakhsh fell." (b) "I was going to Qadirabad to Amir darzi to take back some clothes. I had given them to him 4 or 5 days before. I had got other clothes made by him." (c) "I did not go to Balwant's house at all that day. I did not see Balwant that day." I do not think that any prosecution undertaken as the result of this order need necessarily include all the statements above set out or need be confined to such statements, if it is thought that charges ought to be framed including other statements from the same deposition of the same witness respectively. Those are matters more fit to be decided by the Court undertaking the enquiry and deliberately framing the charges. I say nothing about the merits, except that the charge on which the evidence was given was a serious one resulting in a capital sentence, which this Court quashed on account of the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence which, if untrue, would appear to have been elaborately concocted in concert. The question comes before us upon three applications primarily for sanction. Under the circumstances I would not grant sanction to prosecute if the result of doing so would be to leave the matter in the hands of the applicant.

HANSRAJ SINGH v. BHAGWANA.

Prosecution in this case is justifiable only in the general public interest and should be carefully guarded against becoming a means of oppression or revenge in the hands of individuals. Our attention was drawn to the provisions of section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, as a means of avoiding this contingency. It is on this ground that I think it wise to make an order under that section rather than grant the application in the form in which it is primarily made. On the general question, I recognise that there may be circumstances which justify a Court in refusing to take action under either section. These are considerations which in my judgment are really more fit for executive action than for a judicial Tribunal. Whether the evidence is sufficient to secure the conviction, whether the prosecution is able to present a case with sufficient substance in it to justify its continuance to a hearing, whether the complaint is made with an indirect motive, whether the prosecution may result in terrifying witnesses from coming forward at all in the interests of justice, are matters really for departmental decision. It seems to me that the absence of an authority whose duty it is to decide upon and undertake prosecutions of this kind, is a flaw in the criminal procedure of this country. I cannot sitting here allow myself to condone what seems to be a case of perjury even when apparently committed in the supposed vindication of the law. A judicial Tribunal cannot commit itself to the proposition that the end justifies the means. It seems to me more injurious that a possibly innocent man should be hanged upon perjured evidence than that a possibly guilty one should escape punishment or even reap some advantage from the corrupt conduct of his enemies. Theoretically there is no higher duty laid upon a Court of Law than that of strict enforcing of a strict adherence to truth.

Piggott, J.—I feel bound to add a few words in order to explain my position in this matter. It has never been my practice to wait for an application from any person to move me to exercise the powers conferred upon Courts of Justice by section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in respect of the offences committed before such Courts or brought under their notice in the course of a judicial proceeding. If I think at the time of my order disposing of the judicial proceeding, whatever it may be, that the interests of justice require action to be taken under the section above mentioned, I have invariably taken such action. When disposing of the appeal of Hansraj Singh, I did not at the time think that it was advisable to institute proceedings against any of the witnesses for the prosecution. So far as my experience goes, it is an exceptionally strong step for an Appellate Court to direct a prosecution in respect of evidence which has been believed by the Court which heard it. I cannot say that I am satisfied now that the interests of justice require or will be served by the order in which I propose to concur. The application before us, however, was in the alternative asking either for an order of sanction under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, or for an order under section 476 of the same Code directing an enquiry or trial. An application for sanction merely asks the Court to remove in its discretion a bar which the Legislature has seen fit to impose upon the institution of proceedings in respect of certain classes of offences. When one of two Judges constituting a Bench of this Court is clearly of opinion that the case under consideration is a proper one for the institution of further proceedings, I think it would be improper for his colleague to refuse to concur. I should have found it impossible, therefore, to withhold my concurrence if my learned colleague had desired merely to grant the sanction applied for under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. Under the circumstances of this case we were both agreed that an order under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, was more appropriate than a mere order of sanction to prosecute. I have, therefore, thought it right to concur in the order proposed and I do so accordingly.

Order accordingly.

PATNA HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 140 OF 1917.

April 26, 1917.

*Present:—*Mr. Justice Mullick.

Mahanth KRISHNA DEYAL GIR AND ANOTHER—1ST PARTY—PETITIONERS

versus

Sheikh NIRMALI AND ANOTHER—2ND PARTY
—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145 (6)
—“Due course of law,” meaning of.

The phrase “due course of law” in section 145 (6) of the Criminal Procedure Code does not necessarily mean a decree of a Civil Court, but an order which evicts a party must either be an order of a Civil Court or of a Court acting under statutory authority. In the latter case, there must be a clear indication, express or implied in the terms of the Statute itself, to show that the order has the effect of a decree. [p. 331, col. 2.]

Leo. Moore v. Monoranjan Guha, 12 C. W. N. 696; 7 C. L. J. 547, followed.

Criminal revision against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Gaya, dated 22nd February 1917.

Sir Ali Imam (with him Messrs. P. C. Manuk, S. N. Palit, Kailash Pati and Profulla Kumar Bose), for the Appellants.

Mr. Abanibhushan Murkherji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT. — The first party in these proceedings is a person who claims through the Mahanth of Budh Gaya, and the second party is a person who claims through Irshad Ali Khan by purchase.

It is admitted that the Mahanth is the proprietor in possession of 13 annas

KRISHNA DEYAL GIR V. NIRMALI.

(thirteen annas) of Mouza Jaigir, which is the village in dispute, and that in 1889 he became an usufructuary mortgagee of the remaining 3 annas (three annas) and that on the 29th of April 1916 there was a proceeding under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, between the first party and second party with the result that the first party, was confirmed in possession of the whole of the disputed land. Then at or about the month of July 1916 the second party deposited in the Civil Court, purporting to act under section 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, the amount of the zarpeshgi, but the Mahanth declined to accept the deposit and that matter is still in dispute. It also appears that a litigation is going on about the Mahanth's title by purchase to an one anna odd share of the three annas which the second party claim.

On the 27th of July 1916 the Settlement Officer made an order directing that the second party should be recorded as proprietors in possession of the three-annas share and that the entry in favour of the first party as usufructuary mortgagee should be cancelled. There were then disputes between the parties and a temporary injunction under section 144, Criminal Procedure Code, was issued by the Magistrate on both sides.

Finally on the 2nd of February 1917 the Police reported that the second party was wrongfully interfering with the possession of the first party and that action under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, should be taken against them. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Gaya, however, declined to take action under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, and decided to take action under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code. The present application is made by the first party on the ground that the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate had no jurisdiction to take fresh proceedings under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, while the proceeding of the 29th of April 1916 declaring the possession of the first party remained in force.

Now that proceeding directed that the first party was to be maintained in possession till evicted by due course of law. The question is, has the first party been evicted by due course of law.

The learned Vakil for the second party contends that the Settlement Officer's order amounts to an eviction of the first party by due course of law and he relies upon Leo. Morre v. Monoranjan Guha (1).

It may be admitted that due course of law does not necessarily mean a decree of the Civil Court, but an order which evicts the first party must be either an order of a Civil Court or of a Court acting under statutory authority. In the latter case, there must be a clear indication, express or implied in the terms of the Statute itself, to show that the order has the effect of a decree.

Now here, what was the nature of the Settlement Officer's order? The Settlement Officer's order created no rights. He had only the power to record possession. The record was only a rebuttable piece of evidence and there is no statutory authority by which it can be inferred that such a record has the effect of evicting a person from any property. It is quite clear to my mind that the Settlement Officer had no power to evict the first party by his order.

Let us next look at the Settlement Officer's entry as a piece of evidence. It is contended that upon the entry itself it must be presumed that the second party had legal possession at the time that the entry was made.

It is quite clear, however, from the judgment of the learned Settlement Officer himself that the only ground for cancelling the entry in favour of the first party and substituting an entry in favour of the second party was that the second party had deposited in Court the amount of the usufructuary mortgage. Apparently the Settlement Officer thought that this was sufficient to transfer legal possession and that title passed automatically from the first party to the second party. This, however, was a totally erroneous conception of the law and where, as in this case, the first party does not admit the validity of the deposit, no inference as to the passing of title can be made. The Settlement

BHOLA v. EMPEROR.

Officer's proceedings as evidence rebut themselves and it is quite clear that the entry was incorrect.

It is also further clear that the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate had only the Police report as a basis for action and as the Police themselves reported that the first party was in possession and had continued in possession since the order under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, of the 29th of April 1916, the Settlement Officer's finding, if any such finding can be inferred, to the effect that possession had passed from the first party to the second party, was totally without evidence.

It has been urged that perhaps possession passed by consent, but this is negatived by the relations of parties and the Police report.

Then it is urged that the second party did in fact collect some rents from the tenants after depositing the zarpeshgi money. If that was so, that was an act of trespass. So long as the order under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, remains in force and effect, such an act of trespass would not throw the burden of proving possession upon the first party again.

Therefore, on a review of all the circumstances, it is quite clear that the first party have neither been evicted in due course of law, nor surrendered possession amicably; and that upon the evidence which was before the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate, the proceeding under section 145 made on the 29th of April 1916 was still in force and effect; and if that was so, the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate had no jurisdiction to institute fresh section 145 proceedings between the same parties. The proper course was to take proceedings under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, against the second party, if he thought that the second party was wrongfully disturbing the possession of the first party. It is not contemplated by the law that a successful party in a proceeding under section 145 should be harassed by repeated proceedings under the same section at the instance of the unsuccessful party.

The order of the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate, being in my opinion without jurisdiction, is set aside.

*Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 439—Appealable and non-appealable sentences—Appeal—

—High Court, power of.*

If at one and the same trial an appealable sentence is passed against one or more accused and non-appealable sentences are passed against others and the Sessions Judge, hearing the case on the merits on the appeals of those convicts who had a right of appeal, comes to the conclusion that the convictions are bad as against all the accused persons, he should consider it his duty to refer to the High Court the case of those persons against whom non-appealable sentences were passed, and the matter should then be dealt with by the High Court under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898. [p. 333, col. 1.]

Criminal reference by the Sessions Judge, Meerut, dated the 3rd of May 1917.

JUDGMENT.—This was a case in which eleven persons were jointly tried before a Magistrate of the first class in respect of offences charged under section 409 and section 424 of the Indian Penal Code. Three men were convicted under the former of these sections and received appealable sentences, the remaining eight, Bhola and others, being convicted on a charge under section 424 of the Indian Penal Code, were sentenced to fine only. The three first mentioned appealed to the Sessions Court, and the learned Sessions Judge, in a carefully reasoned judgment, has accepted their appeal on the facts. He has accordingly set aside the convictions and sentences against these three men and has acquitted them and ordered their release. The case of the eight men against whom unappealable sentences were passed has been referred to this Court. As the Code of Criminal Procedure at present stands, there is room for controversy as to whether in a case like the present an appeal from those accused persons in respect of whom the sentence passed was individually unappealable is barred by the provisions of section 413 of that Code. I take this opportunity of stating that, although I have myself expressed and acted upon the view that the provisions of section 413 aforesaid do not operate so as to take away the right of appeal, which would otherwise be conferred, in any case tried by a Magistrate of the first class, to the Court of Session by section 408. I find that this view has not been generally accepted in this Court and has been expressly dissented from by the present Acting Chief Justice. I do not propose, therefore, further to insist on my own individual view in this matter. So far as I am concerned, the law may be taken as settled in accordance with what I admit to have been the prevailing practice in this Court. If, therefore, at one and the same trial, an appealable sentence is passed against one or more accused and unappealable sentences against others, and the learned Sessions Judge, hearing the case on the merits on the appeals of those convicts who had a right of appeal, comes to the conclusion that the convictions were bad as against all the persons accused, he should consider it his duty to refer to this Court the case of those persons against whom unappealable sentences were passed. The matter can then be dealt with by this Court under its general revisional jurisdiction, as provided by section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The procedure is clumsy and I hope to see it amended by a reasonable modification of the Code. At present this must be taken as the settled procedure of this Court under the Code as it stands. I have no doubt that the learned Sessions Judge was right in this case. I accept his reference and for the reasons given by him, I set aside the convictions and sentences against Bhola and each of the other seven men named in the referring order. I acquit them of the offence; charged and direct that the fines imposed upon them if paid, be refunded.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145—Arbitration—Magistrate, whether can make reference—Jurisdiction.

A Magistrate, acting under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code, has no jurisdiction even with the parties' consent to refer the dispute to arbitration, and to make an order in regard to the possession of the parties upon the award of the arbitrators. [p. 3-4, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, Sitamarhi, Darbhanga.

Mr. L. N. Singh, for the Appellants.

Mr. Lakshmi Kanta Jha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The point for decision is whether a Magistrate, acting under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, is authorized to refer a dispute to arbitration and to make an order in regard to the possession of parties upon the award of the arbitrators. The jurisdiction of the High Court to interfere in orders under section 145 Criminal Procedure Code, has been discussed by a Full Bench of this Court in Parmessar Singh v. Kailaspati (1), and it has been decided that where there has been a refusal to exercise jurisdiction or an absence of jurisdiction or an excess of jurisdiction has been exercised with material irregularity, the High Court can interfere.

Here the question is whether reference of a case to arbitrators, even though made with the consent of parties, and a decision of the case based upon the award of the arbitrators is not an illegal exercise of jurisdiction or refusal to exercise jurisdiction. It has been held in Hamidul Haq v. Ataet Hossain (2) that a Court has no jurisdiction to delegate its functions and to refer the dispute to arbitration without trying the case under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, and that the decision of a case on the award of the arbitrators is not a legal exercise of jurisdiction.

It is contended on behalf of the second party that there is nothing in the Criminal Procedure Code which prohibits a Magistrate to make a reference to arbitration if the parties consent to do so and that even if it is contrary to the provisions of the Code to make such a reference, the error is at most an irregularity and in no case can amount to an illegal exercise of jurisdiction.

There is, however, no authority cited in support of this argument. The learned Vakil relies, firstly, upon Janki Miser v. Klika Miser (3). In that case a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court did not give any reasons for its order, but merely remarked that upon the merits of the case they declined to interfere. Stevens, J., one of the Judges, does appear to have said: "As the parties themselves had consented to an arbitration they had no right to complain in revision," but no reasons were assigned for the dictum and it must be treated as merely obiter. The other learned Judge, who was a member of the Bench, passed his order only upon the merits and he appears to have thought that substantial justice had been done.

The next case on which the learned Vakil relies is Taramoni Chaudhurani v. Gyanendra Mohan Chaudhurani (4). In that case Brett and Harington, JJ., of the Calcutta High Court directed that the Magistrate should take into consideration the award of the arbitrators. The learned Judges, however, refrained from saying whether the award would be legal evidence and whether the Court was bound to abide by it. On the other hand in Banwari Lal Mukerjee v. Hriday Chakravarti (5), the learned Judges of a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court ruled that the Code does not contemplate reference to arbitration under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, but they went on to express the opinion that the error in this respect did not perhaps amount to an illegal exercise of jurisdiction. They did not, however, pronounce any definite opinion upon the point.

(4) 7 C. W. N. 461.

(5) 32 C. 552; 1 C. L. J. 432; 2 Cr. L. J. 347.

To my mind the matter is perfectly clear. Under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate has to make an inquiry himself and to pass the order after applying his judicial mind to the facts of the case, and to the evidence adduced by the parties. He cannot divest himself of the case by delegating the decision to arbitrators even though appointed by consent of parties. To accept the award of the arbitrators as the sole basis of the decision is to substitute the mind of the arbitrators for the mind of the Court; and that is where the refusal to exercise jurisdiction arises. A Court may always direct inquiries and call for reports and may, where such reports are evidence, take them into consideration, but an arbitration is a different matter altogether, for there the Court accepts the award of the arbitrators as the final pronouncement upon the facts. Looked at in this light, the arbitrators' award in this case was entirely without jurisdiction and its acceptance by the learned Magistrate as the only basis for his decision constitutes a refusal to exercise jurisdiction.

There are two further defects in the Magistrate's proceedings.

The so-called award had been returned by only two of the arbitrators and, therefore, it was not a complete award on which the Court should have acted.

The other point is that one member of the first party objected to the award, saying that his guardian had no right to consent to the reference. This point was not decided by the learned Magistrate.

So, even if there was jurisdiction to act on the award, there has been material irregularity in the exercise of that jurisdiction.

The question is not one of simple irregularity; in my opinion, there was a total absence of jurisdiction.

But even if the learned Magistrate's acts in making the reference at all and in accepting a defective award amount only to irregularities, then the irregularities were serious and material irregularity and entitled the first party to invoke the aid of this Court.

The order of the Magistrate will, therefore, be set aside and the proceedings quashed. If there is still a fear of a breach of the peace the Magistrate will be at liberty to take fresh proceedings.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 424—Mischief—Landlord and tenant—Bhaoli danabandi tenant, right of, to remove crop—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 239—Several tenants holding separate lands of same landlord charged with mischief, whether can be tried together.

A bhaoli danabandi tenant can remove the crop either to the threshing floor or to his house, provided he does so in due course of husbandary. But before he cuts his crop he must give the landlord reasonable opportunity of appraising it. [p. 335, col. 2]

Where five tenants who act in concert are charged with the offence of mischief, committed in respect of different plots in their respective possessions they can be jointly tried under section 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 336, col. 1.]

Criminal reference made by the Sessions Judge, Gaya.

Rai Tribhuan Nath Sahai and Mr. Murari Prasad, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—This reference has been made by the learned Sessions Judge of Gaya and raises a somewhat interesting point of law.

The five petitioners are tenants on the bhaoli danabandi system. It is alleged by the prosecution that on the 10th of December 1916 the petitioners began to cut the ripe paddy from their respective holdings. The servants of the zemindar thereupon remonstrated on the ground that the zemindar had not had time to appraise the crop, but the tenants did not listen and carried away the crop according to some witnesses to their respective threshing floors and according to other witnesses to their houses.

On the 12th of December a complaint was lodged on behalf of the zemindar against five petitioners charging them with an offence under section 424, Indian Penal Code,¹ that is to say committing mischief in respect of their own property in order to cause wrongful loss to the landlord.

The defence of the tenants was that the landlord had in fact appraised the crop some seven or eight days before the date of the cutting, but that defence was disbelieved with the result that the Deputy Magistrate of Gaya has convicted the accused and sentenced them to a fine of Rs. 15 each. It appears that after the crop was carried away the landlord on the 19th of December lodged an application under section 69, Bengal Tenancy Act, before the Collector asking for the appraisal of the crop. There is no evidence before me as to what was the result of that case.

The learned Vakil for the petitioner has strenuously contended that there could have been no dishonest intention on the part of the petitioners inasmuch as section 71, Bengal Tenancy Act, allows the tenants to cut and harvest the produce in due course of husbandary without any interference on the part of the landlord. He also urges that clause 4, section 71, declares how the appraisal is to be made, if the tenant removes any portion of the produce in such a manner as to prevent its due appraisal at the proper time.

Now clause 2, section, 71, expressly enacts that a tenant holding on the bhaoli batai system is not entitled to remove the crop from his threshing floor, and it has been held in Kuldip Pandey v. Ramnath Singh (1) that if a tenant does so remove the produce he is liable to punishment under section 424, Indian Penal Code. But it is contended that the bhaoli danabandi tenant is in a better position and that there is nothing to bar his removing the crop either to the threshing floor or to his house, if this is done in due course of husbandary. I accept this contention so far as it goes, but clearly it is subject to a qualification and that qualification is that before the tenant cuts his crop, he must give the landlord reasonable opportunity of appraising it.

Here the landlord gives evidence that his men remonstrate with the tenants at the time of cutting and he denies that he had any opportunity of appraising the crop. The tenants set up the case that the landlord had in fact appraised the crop earlier and that case has been disbelieved. The onus of proving in these circumstances that reasonable opportunity was given to the landlord is upon the tenants. I have gone through the evidence and there is nothing to show that the onus has been discharged.

Then it is contended that there could have been no intention to cause wrongful loss to the landlord, for the paddy was stored at the threshing floor. This is not conclusively established by the evidence and even if it had been for the landlord's purpose, such storage would have been useless unless the produce of each field had been separately ticketed so that the landlord might have been able to appraise the outturn of that field. If it had been the intention of the tenants to give reasonable opportunity to the landlord to appraise the crop, they would have stored the produce of each field in order that the landlord might have had no difficulty in knowing what was the outturn per bigha of the plots in question. Reading the proceedings as a whole, I have no doubt that the charge of mala fides against the tenants has been conclusively established.

The result, therefore, is that the reference will be disallowed and the conviction and sentence affirmed.

Another point which has been argued by the Vakil is that the trial of five tenants holding separate lands in one proceeding is contrary to law. Now that depends on whether the tenants acted in concert. If they did so act, the fact that the offence of mischief was committed in respect of different plots in the possession of different persons would be immaterial. For the purpose of the Indian Penal Code only one offence can be said to have been committed, when there is evidence of jointness and concert. In this case there is such evidence and, therefore, the procedure was not vitiated by any irregularity. Under the circumstances it was incumbent upon the accused to show that they did not act in concert and this they have not been able to do.

Reference disallowed.

No appeal lies against an order refusing to restore an application to set aside an appellate decree which has been dismissed. But where there has been a serious miscarriage of justice, the High Court will admit the case on the revisional side.

First appeal from an order of the Second Additional Judge, Aligarh, dated the 14th December 1915.

Mr. Girdhari Lal Agarwala, for the Appellant.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case we are of opinion that there is no right of appeal. The order complained of is an order, dated the 14th of December 1915, refusing to restore an application which had already been dismissed on the 26th of November, which application was to set aside an appellate decree of the 21st of August. We are of opinion that although the Court below might, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, as we said yesterday, restore the application, there is no appeal against its refusal, but following what we said yesterday, if we were satisfied that there is reason to think that there has been a serious miscarriage of justice, we might have admitted the case as a revision and allowed it to be argued on that footing. We are not satisfied for many reasons that there has been a miscarriage of justice, and it is sufficient to say that the absence of the party now applying from the application of the 26th of November, which was the reason for its refusal, is to this moment unexplained. Under these circumstances the Court cannot grant a revision. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appsal dismissed.

Alluvion and diluvion—Re-formation in situ—Limitation—Burden of proof—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 2, Sch II, Arts. 142, 144—Dispossession—Exclusive adverse possession.

A chur, which was found to be a re-formation in situ of plaintiff's land, was occupied for some years by Government. It was then claimed by defendants as their property, and Government made over possession to them. On plaintiff's suing to recover possession, defendants pleaded limitation and to make out their plea claimed to tack on to their own occupation the period of Government's possession:

Held, that the defendants did not derive their liability to be sued "from or through" the Revenue Authorities within the meaning of section 2 (4) of the Indian Limitation Act and that, therefore, their plea must fail. [p. 344, col. 1.]

The Limitation Act of 1877 does not define the term "dispossession", but its meaning is well settled. A man may cease to use his land because he cannot use it, since it is under water. He does not thereby discontinue his possession: constructively it continues until he is dispossessed, and upon the cessation of the dispossession before the lapse of the statutory period, constructively it revives. [p. 343, col. 1.]

There can be no discontinuance by absence of use and enjoyment, when the land is not capable of use and enjoyment. Similarly there can be no continuance of adverse possession, when the land is not capable of use and enjoyment, so long as such adverse possession must rest on de facto use and occupation. When sufficient time has elapsed to extinguish the old title and start a new one, the new owner's possession continues until there is fresh dispossession and revives as it ceases. [p. 343, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Calcutta High Court, dated July 12, 1909, reported as 3 Ind. Cas. 15, reversing a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Nuddia, dated June 30, 1906.

FACTS.—A certain zemindari of the Hooghly District was long ago divided into separate mahals, known as lot Mahomed Aminpur and lot Gobindpur respectively. Plaintiffs-appellants are the proprietors of a half of lot Mahomed Aminpur, the owner of the other half being Maharajah Sir J. M. Tagore. The respondents other than the Secretary of State, the Kundu Babus, are proprietors of lot Gobindpur.

The lands in suit were alleged by plaintiffs and admitted in the first Court by defendants to be re-formations in situ of diluviated lands of three mouzahs, which admittedly appertained as to 10 annas to lot Mahomed Aminpur and as to 6 annas to lot Gobindpur.

The lands re-formed gradually from about 1839 onwards. A chur formed and increased year by year: for some years it was entirely submerged in the rains. The Revenue Authorities at first settled annually so much as was cultivable with the actual cultivators on the utbandi system, and later made longer settlements. Up to 1894 plaintiffs were minors under the Court of Wards. About 1903 both plaintiffs and the Kundu Babus laid claim to the lands. Government allowed the claim of the Kundu Babus and delivered possession to them.

Thereafter in 1904, appellants sued the Kundu Babus to recover possession, also impleading their co-owner the Maharajah.

The Kundu Babus (hereinafter described as the respondents) denied plaintiffs' title and pleaded inter alia limitation on the ground of adverse possession.

The Subordinate Judge held that plaintiffs' title was made out and that the suit was not barred by limitation. He gave plaintiffs a decree. On appeal his decision was reversed by the Calcutta High Court (Chitty and Carnduff, JJ.), who held that Government was in possession of portions of the land from 1889 adversely to plaintiffs, and (impliedly) that such possession was continuous. They further held that the burden of proving that the possession of Government and the respondents did not extend for twelve years to the whole of the land lay on the plaintiffs and had not been discharged. They dismissed plaintiffs' suit.

Hence this appeal.

Sir R. Finlay, K. C. (with him Mr. Kenworthy Brown), for the Appellants.—There are two questions in this case, (1) title, (2) limitation. Title has been found in our favour by the Sub-Judge. The High Court indicated some doubts, but did not overrule his finding. Limitation was decided in our favour by the Sub-Judge, but against us by the High Court.

BASANTA KUMAR ROY v. SECRETARY OF STATE.

Article 144 of Schedule II, Limitation Act, 1877, applies. The High Court have erroneously allowed respondents to reckon in the time during which the chur was in the possession of Government. Government was in no sense respondents' predecessor any more than they were ours.

Further plaintiffs were all infants under the Court of Wards, and Government could not hold possession adversely to their own wards.

In addition, plaintiffs and some of the respondents were tenants-in-common, and the receipt of rent by one tenant-in-common does not in India amount to exclusion of the others.

[SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS referred to Trustees and Agency Co. v. Short (1). It has been held in India that where there has been a long exclusive possession you may presume an ouster, but that ouster does not begin from the commencement of the exclusive possession.]

There is nothing in India corresponding to 3 and 4 Will. IV c. 27, nor is there any decision as to the time after which ouster is presumed.

The burden of proving adverse possession is on the respondents—Radha Gobind Roy Saheb v. Inglis (2), Secretary of State v. Chelikani Rama Rao (3).

The twelve years' adverse possession required by Article 144 must be twelve years' adverse possession by the defendant or by some one through whom he claims—vide definitions of "defendant", "plaintiff" in section 2 (4) and (8) of the Indian Limitation Act.

Adverse possession by a series of independent trespassers confers no right on any one of them who has not himself had uninterrupted possession for the period required by law—Dixon v. Gayfere (4), though Cockburn, C. J., commented adversely on this case in Asher v. Whitlock (5), Trustees and Agency Co. v. Short (1).

Here there was no possibility for any one to have continuous possession for twelve years before suit, as the whole chur was periodically submerged up to a later date: such submergence determines the possession of a trespasser: Secretary of State v. Krishnamoni Gupta (6).

Under the present law of limitation plaintiffs need not prove they were in possession within twelve years of suit: they may sue within twelve years from the time when the possession of the defendant, or of some person through whom he claims, became adverse to them: Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (7).

Article 144 as to adverse possession only applies when there is no other article which specially provides for the case—Mahammud Amanulla Khan v. Badan Singh (8).

The law is not the same when the rightful owners sue ryots to recover possession. There the plaintiffs must prove possession within twelve years of suit: Mohima Chunder Mozoomdar v. Mohesh Chunder Neoghi (9).

But that is because Article 142 applies. Here the Article applicable is 144.

The view that the onus in such a case lies on defendant was adopted in Innasimuttu Udayan v. Upakarath Udayan (10), where, however, it was held that he had sustained it. Here the respondents are quite unable to sustain the onus. The plaintiffs were Wards of Court, and it was the duty of Government to look after them. Government never intended to set up a claim against them.

Respondents did not claim under Government but against it.

BASANTA KUMAR ROY v. SECRETARY OF STATE.

Further, the possession of a tenant-in-common is for all the tenants, not for himself alone.

As to a small portion of Hatikanda, one of the three mouzahs in suit, there is no defence, as Government did not release it till 1904.

Respondents in their case lodged before this Board dispute the identity of the lands. As to propounding riddles of this kind, vide Rajkumar Roy v. Gobind Chunder Roy (11).

Mr. Kenworthy Brown followed.—A large portion of the land in suit emerged after Government gave up possession, and the emergence is still going on.

It may be true that under the old law the burden of proof in these cases lay on the plaintiff to prove possession within twelve years of suit: Maharajah Koowur Baboo Nitrasur Singh v. Baboo Nund Lall Singh (12), Koomar Runjit Singh v. Schoene Kilburn (13).

The latter case was two or three years before this Board's decision in Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (7), and was under the old Limitation Act. Until 1881 the view then taken prevailed to some extent even under the new Act: but the law was altered in 1871 by Act IX of 1871, and this was clearly laid down by this Board in Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (7).

The respondents now dispute the identity of the lands, and claim that a great part of them are part of an older chur which they occupied long ago. This is a new case altogether.

The evidence shows that up to 1893-4 only a very small portion of these lands had emerged at all. At the time when Government gave over possession even this much was completely under water from June to October. It was not possible, therefore, for a title by adverse possession to be acquired. Disturbance by vis major of the flood is tantamount to abandonment and interrupts continuous possession: Secretary of State v. Krishnamoni (6).

The duration of the abandonment is immaterial. The principle applies whether it is for 150 days or for several years.

[LORD SUMNER.—It would seem that even if Government ever asserted adverse possession they abandoned it.]

Lord Canning by a proclamation cancelled all titles in Oudh. When that proclamation was withdrawn as to Lucknow the intervening time was simply wiped out. Mirza Jehan Kadar v. Afsur Bahu (14).

[LORD SUMNER.—The Collector's order is simply a formal way of retiring from possession and leaving those entitled to possession to take it.]

As to possession of co-owners, the fundamental rule is that possession by one will not be presumed to be adverse to the others but will ordinarily be held for the benefit of all. Jogendra Nath Rai v. Baladeo Das (15) where the previous cases are discussed. The same case lays down another proposition on which we rely, viz., that the doctrine of constructive possession applied only in favour of a rightful owner (page 972). Even if Government were in possession of a small fragment adversely that was not possession of the whole.

[LORD SUMNER.—Some of the lands which have emerged belonged to two other mouzahs altogether, and for all the evidence there is to the contrary the lands occupied before 1894 may have been that part.]

Mr. O'Gorman, for the Respondents.—I contend that the whole of these mouzahs belonged to Lot Gobindpur, not merely 10 annas. If these villages had been divided into 10 annas and 6 annas, the proportions of revenue would have been the same.

[LORD PARKER.—The assessment is on the whole mahal, not on particular villages.]

The plaintiffs have not made out their title to these three mauzahs. They have never produced any document showing they were registered as proprietor under the Bengal Land Registration Act of 1876. Certain papers they did in fact produce, but the Judges of the High Court were not satisfied that those papers made out their case.

[LORD SUMNER.—It is a question of fact. The first Court is satisfied. The second Court have criticised the Sub-Judge's methods, but have not taken upon themselves to say he was wrong. Do you want us to send the case back? It began in 1904.]

We produced our copy of the general register, and their omission to do the same raises a strong presumption that they were not owners of the 10 annas as they alleged.

Next, we allege that we were in possession of this land or a part of it since 1886. This appears from map No. 14.

[LORD PARKER.—I can't find anything about that in the pleadings or in your "case".]

[LORD SUMNER.—Is there anything in the whole record except the maps to show that you had or claimed possession in 1886?]

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., (intervening).—We propose to show that plaintiffs' claim includes more than is in the new chur—Chur Raninagar No. 2.

[LORD SUMNER asked Sir R. Finlay if he claimed any more of the land than was in Chur No. 2.]

Sir R. Finlay.—We believe that it is all Chur No. 2, but we do not abandon any part of our claim.

[LORD PARKER.—I can't find this point intelligibly raised anywhere.]

I submit it is not open to them.

Plaintiffs would not at first state the boundaries intelligibly: hence we could not tell what they claimed.

Counsel went into the maps and other evidence and contended that most of the land in fact fell within Chur No. 1.

The Article of the Limitation Act to be applied even as regards Chur No. 2, still more as regards Chur No. 1, is Article 142, not Article 144. Plaintiffs have been dispossessed within the meaning of Article 142 more than twelve years before suit and are barred: Mohammud Amanulla Khan v. Badan Singh (8).

There is no question of co-ownership in the ordinary sense; the estates are separate and the owners pay separate revenue.

Even if Article 144 applies, Government has held adversely for more than twelve years.

The possession of Government is my possession. Government took possession not on behalf of anybody else, but as owner or proprietor: it was asserting its right under Bengal Regulation XI of 1825, section 4. Even as regards Chur No. 2, regular tenancy commenced in 1891, and before that date there had been utbandi tenancy. If the plaintiffs had sued Government only in 1904, their suit would have been dismissed. Their title has been extinguished under section 28 of the Limitation Act, and cannot be revived.

As to title, their case is that we have 6 annas only of these three mouzahs. The copy of the general register produced by us shows that we are entitled to the whole 6 annas.

JUDGMENT.

LORD SUMNER.—This suit was brought by members of a family called the Kumars of Dighapatia against certain persons, called collectively the Kundu Babus of Mahiari, to recover khas possession, jointly with their co-sharer maliks, of a 10-anna share in portions of Mouzahs Durlabhpur, Jirat, and Hatikanda. Wasilat was also claimed. Some years ago the Ganges overflowed these lands. They have now re-formed in situ.

The plaintiffs held one moiety of the zemindari lot Mahomed Aminpur, the other moiety being held by various persons, who were jointed as subordinate defendants. To this mahal, bearing Touzi No. 3989 of the Hooghly Collectorate, this 10-anna share was said to have belonged for at least a century. The 6-anna share was the property of the principal defendants in right of their zemindari, viz., lot Gobindpur bearing Touzi No. 100. The Trial Judge found for the plaintiffs' title. The High Court criticised this decision as having been arrived at "without any real discussion or consideration of the documentary evidence," but did not expressly dissent from it. They allowed the appeal on another ground. Having examined the documentary evidence in question with some care, their Lordships conclude that the decision of the Trial Judge in this regard was right.

The plaintiffs put in an extract from the quinquennial register of Pergunnah Mahomed Aminpur, for A. D. 1816, which showed that a 10-anna share in each of the three mouzahs then belonged to Talug Mahomed Aminpur. An extract from the Mahalwari Register, apparently for A. D. 1880, showed these mouzahs still belonging to Mahomed Aminpur, though not under the same Touzi number, and stated the maliks, as recorded in the general register, to be certain persons of whom one was Purna Chandra Roy, the plaintiffs' predecessor-in-title. It further remarked that part or all of the land of these mouzahs was ijmali, without naming either the co-sharers or the proportions of the shares. No doubt these entries are in some respects inconclusive. For several years, from 1888 onwards until 1894, when the guardianship of the Court ended, the plaintiffs were minors, whose property was in the charge of the Court of Wards, and they produced documents showing that year after year each of these mouzahs was administered on their behalf, and that rents and profits collected in respect of them were credited to the account of the plaintiffs. Amdanis of money on account of rent, Touzi accounts, extracts from the jumma wasil-baki accounts and karcha accounts were forthcoming in regular sequence, in which the plaintiffs were stated to be proprietors and their share to be a 10-anna share in Touzi No. 3989. To these proofs of enjoyment no real answer was made and their Lordships see no reason to question the finding of the Trial Judge in favour of the plaintiffs' title.

The identity of the lands in suit held by the principal defendants with those originally washed away, to which the plaintiffs made title, was accepted by the Trial Judge, doubted but not decided by the High Court, and strenuously contested before their Lordships. Before the trial an ameen was appointed to survey the locus in quo and set it out on a map. The limits of the ground in dispute were agreed and shown on this map. Portions of each of the three mauzahs fell beyond them. At the instance of the principal defendants the ameen also prepared a map purporting to show the natural features "as contained in the release map of 1886." In his report he stated that the latter features depended on the position of a palm-tree, which was taken as the datum because it was said to be the only thing that had survived from 1886, and to be identical with a palm tree shown on a copy map produced by the defendants and alleged to be a map of things as they were in that year. No proof of the identity of this palm-tree was forthcoming: no thak map was produced; no release of 1886 or any evidence of it was put in. It is plain that the ameen thought that this map of the supposed features of 1886 was not worth much, and their Lordships think so too.

The respondents' argument rested on three points: first, that since 1886 they had been, as they said, in possession of certain portions of a chur known as Chur Raninagar No. 1, that by superimposing the ameen's 1886 map on his survey of 1906, it would be seen that part of the area disputed in this action, though claimed as part of Chur Raninagar No. 2, really fell within Chur Raninagar No. 1, and that there had been a confusion of Mouzah Jirat, which lay in the north of the disputed area, with an area called Chur Jirat, which lay outside of it and to the south, some miles away. Their Lordships' Board has had occasion before now [Rajkumar Roy's case (11)] to deprecate the practice of "propounding riddles of this kind," and to point out how rarely they succeed. It may be doubted if such efforts are worth the labour they involve. After the best consideration that they could give, their Lordships are clear on one point only, namely, that this case was not made at all at the trial, and is not made out now. The Trial Judge records that "it is admitted on both sides that the lands in suit are re-formations on their old sites of diluviated lands of Mouzahs Darlabhpur, Jirat, and Hatikanda." On that admission he proceeded, and by that admission, in their Lordships' opinion, the respondents must be bound. In the result the plaintiffs have made out their case alike as to title and parcels.

There remains the question on which alone the High Court proceeded, the question of limitation. This involves some account of the history of the re-formed land. At the date of the Government Survey of 1869 and 1870 the there mouzas lay to the west of the Bhaghirathi. Shortly after that date the river began to traverse bodily to the south-west, in a direction at right angles to the axis of its course at that part of the stream, and steadily moved for some miles across country till in 1906 only portions of Jirat and Hatikanda, and no part of the Durlabhpur were any longer to the west of the river. The total area submerged no doubt extended far beyond the bounds of these mouzas. As the river passed on churs began to form. Chur Raninagar No. 1 was the first; Chur Raninagar No. 2, somewhere within which the present re-formations fall, began to appear as an island chur in 1888. The plaint in the present suit was filed on the 6th September 1904. It is common ground that the period of limitation applicable is twelve years, the contest being whether Article 142 of Schedule II of Act XV of 1877 is the Article applicable or Article 144. The critical time is the time prior to the 6th September 1892.

A great body of evidence was called, of which the Trial Judge says that the witnesses "have sworn hard without any regard to truth." Neither side has ever thought it worth while to quote what they said to their Lordships. If the appellants are right, the question is whether the respondents had adverse possession before September 1892; if the respondents are right, the question is whether before that time the appellants had not been dispossessed. A good deal has been said about the burden of proof in either case, but as their Lordships find the evidence sufficient to establish a clear conclusion of fact, it cannot matter now by which party it was given. Their Lordships accordingly pass by the question who would have suffered if the facts had turned out otherwise or had not been proved at all, and proceed to examine them.

The best evidence of the history of the chur lands in question is to be found in the Collectrate reports of the Settlements of 1894, 1899, and 1902. An island chur in or about this spot was thrown up in 1888, but was unfit for assessment, and apparently for cultivation, till 1890. At first the surrounding water was unfordable on all sides, but further accretions soon attached it on the north to Chur Raninagar No. 1. In 1889 it was first treated as an accretion to Chur Raninagar No. 1 and Jirat, which had been released to Suksagar zemindars, as re-formations in situ of their mouzas, and then shortly afterwards came to be considered as an accretion to the part of Chur Raninagar No. 1, which was a Government estate. It was not regularly surveyed till 1894, but, beginning in the year 1891-1892, it was under direct management on the utbandi system on yearly settlements. The area then producing a rent was about 350 bighas; in the following year it was slightly more. On the survey in 1894 the area of this chur was found to be 2,060 bighas, of which 583 were by this time under cultivation. The residue was uncultivated jungle, and the whole of it was every year completely under water from the beginning of June to the end of October. Naturally, the land was then very poor, and there was no resident *raiya*t in the mahal.

The chur had so far increased by 1894 that a *raiya*t wari settlement was then made with the utbandi *raiya*t for a term of five years. On the expiration of this term it was again surveyed, and its area was found to have increased to over 3,000 bighas, and 86½ acres of it were released to the proprietor of estate No. 399, as being land which was a re-formation in situ of his *Mouza*h Sardanga. It would seem that a further portion of it had been previously released to the owner of *Mouza*h Baliadunga. The cultivable lands were then settled again for an undefined term.

In 1902 the principal defendants petitioned the Collector of Nuddia for the release to them of the lands in question, alleging that they were re-formations in situ of lands belonging to their estate, lot Gobindpur, Touzi No. 100, and ten months later the Officiating Collector granted the petition. In his judgment the petitioners had proved their title and the identity of the re-formed lands, and the Government could not legitimately resist their claim. Accordingly possession was delivered in due form, by planting a bamboo on the estate, by proclamation, and by beat of drum.

The report of 1899 in terms speaks of these re-formed lands as being the "property" of the Government resumed in 1888, which at most means that in time the Government's actual possession, such as it was, might be expected to ripen into ownership. The report of 1902 speaks of possession, direct management, and settlement. The order of 1903, while avoiding the term "property," because it recognised the property of the petitioners, recited that the Government took possession of Chur Raninagar No. 2 in 1888, the year in which it came into existence as a chur. These documents, however, were reciting what had happened some years before, and presumably after some change of Collectors in the meantime, and it is very noticeable that in the khasras of the chur the column headed "Name of proprietor and landlord" appears to have been left blank until 1899, when it is filled in for the first time with the name of the Empress of India.

The Limitation Act of 1877 does not define the term "dispossession," but its meaning is well settled. A man may cease to use his land because he cannot use it, since it is under water. He does not thereby discontinue his possession: constructively it continues, until he is dispossessed; and, upon the cessation of the dispossession before the lapse of the statutory period, constructively it revives. "There can be no discontinuance by absence of use and enjoyment, when the land is not capable of use and enjoyment" [per Cotton, L. J., in Leigh v. Jack (16)]. It seems to follow that there can be no continuance of adverse possession, when the land is not capable of use and enjoyment, so long as such adverse possession must rest on de facto use and occupation. When sufficient time has elapsed to extinguish the old title and start a new one, the new owner's possession, of course, continues until there is fresh dispossession, and revives as it ceases.

In the case of Secretary of State v. Krishnamoni (6), their Lordships' Board applied this view to a case, where a river shifting its course first in one direction and then in the opposite direction, first exposed certain submerged lands, of which the Government took possession, and then after a few years flooded them again. No rational distinction can be drawn between that case and the present one where the re-flooding was seasonal and occurred for several months in each year. It was held that when the land was re-submerged the possession of the Government determined and that, while it remained submerged, no possession could be deemed to continue so as to be available towards the ultimate acquisition of title against the true owner.

Again to apply the test suggested by Bramwell, L. J., in Leigh v. Jack (16) at page 273, "to defeat a title by dispossessing the former owner, acts must be done, which are inconsistent with his enjoyment of the soil for the purposes for which he intended to use it," and, therefore, it is necessary to look at the position in which the former owner stands towards the land, as well as to the acts done by the alleged dispossessor. "It is impossible," says Lord Halsbury in Marshall v. Taylor (17), "to speak with exact precision about the degree of possession or dispossession that will do, unless you have regard, as Lord Justice Cotton said in Leigh v. Jack (16), to the nature of the property." An exclusive adverse possession for a sufficient period may be made out, in spite of occasional acts done by the former owner on the ground for a specific purpose from time to time. Conversely acts which prima facie are acts of dispossession may under particular circumstances fall short of evidencing any kind of ouster. They may be susceptible of another explanation, bear some other character or have some other object. In the present case beyond the temporary utbandi cultivation itself there is nothing down to 1892 to show an exclusion of the plaintiffs by the Revenue Authorities.

Their Lordships are of opinion that, whatever may have been the case later on, there had not been, down to September 1892, any dispossession of the plaintiffs within the meaning of Article 142. The evidence of possession by the Government consists in the direct management under which bandobastdars cultivated at annual rents. Two Collectors' orders, dated in 1889, are referred to, but not exhibited, under which the land was first of all "treated" as an accretion to one property and almost immediately afterwards "considered" as an accretion to another; but beyond the utbandi cultivation, nothing was done. Whether the land cultivated was the same each year or not does not appear; at any rate, it was annually submerged, and there are no circumstances to link together various portions of the ground, so as to make the possession of a part, as it emerged, amount constructively to possession of the whole; Mohini Mohan Roy v. Premoda Nath Roy (18). The lands in question in this suit form only a part of Chur Raninagar No. 2. It cannot be shown that they formed part of the land cultivated, or of the chur which had emerged up to 1892. It is quite possible that most, if not all, of the land cultivated between 1891 and 1893 may have belonged to the land, which was shortly afterwards released to the Baliadunga and Sardanga zemindars. It is clear that in those early years there was considerable uncertainty as to the course the re-formation was taking, and the fact must have been well known that the chur might turn out to be a re-formation in situ of the land, which had only diluviated within the previous twenty years.

If, as their Lordships think, no dispossession occurred, except possibly within twelve years before the commencement of this suit, Article 144 is the Article applicable, and not Article 142. It is not easy to see in the circumstances of a case such as this how conduct insufficient to evidence dispossession of the plaintiffs can be used to evidence adverse possession available to the defendants; but, be that as it may, in their Lordships' opinion the defendants' contention resting on Article 144 fails on another ground. The period of time requisite to bring the defendants under the protection of Article 144 cannot be made out, unless to the period during which the defendants have been in possession there is tacked, out of the prior period when it is contended that the Revenue Authorities had possession, a number of years going back to 1892. The definition section, section 2, shows that in the present case this cannot be done. The defendants do not derive their liability to be sued "from or through" the Revenue Authorities in any sense of the words. They advanced a claim of their own adversely to the Revenue Authorities, which was rested on prior title and possession, and sought to put an end to conduct on the part of those authorities which, they asserted, was inconsistent with and an invasion of their own superior title. On investigation the Revenue Authorities recognised and submitted to this adverse claim and withdrew from any enjoyment or occupation. If the defendants could make good now the claim which they made then, well and good; but they would succeed, not by reason of, but independently of the Limitation Act. Upon this ground they fail as far as Article 144 is concerned.

In this view of the case it is not necessary to decide two points much discussed before their Lordships: first, that the defendants' possession could not as such be deemed to be adverse to their co-sharers or available to deprive the plaintiffs of their rights; and, second, that the possession of the Revenue Authorities could not be availed of against the plaintiffs by reason of their being at the time minors under the guardianship of the Court of Wards. In differing from the High Court upon the determination of the appeal, their Lordships do not wish to be taken as expressing any opinion adverse to their view on this second point.

In the result their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed with costs, the judgment of the High Court should be set aside with costs, and the decision of the Trial Judge should be restored. As the first defendant on the record, the Secretary of State for India in Council, lodged no case and did not appear before their Lordships to support or resist the appeal, their Lordships do not advise that the terms of any order as to costs should affect him.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case, so far as it is necessary to state them for the purposes of this appeal, are as follows:—A mortgage was made in 1823 of certain property. One of the mortgagors was Sheikh Dalilullah, who owned a two-annas eight-pies share out of the sixteen annas mortgaged. The present plaintiff is one of the descendants of Dalilullah. The other descendants and heirs of Dalilullah are also parties to the suit, having been made pro forma defendants. Admittedly the integrity of the mortgage has been broken up and the mortgagee is now owner of thirteen annas four pies out of the sixteen annas. The plaintiff sought to redeem the whole of the two-annas eight-pies share which originally belonged to Dalilullah. The Court of First Instance gave her a decree. The Lower Appellate Court has held, on the strength of the rulings of this Court, that the plaintiff is only entitled to redeem her own share. That share has been ascertained. The plaintiff comes here in second appeal and she pleads that she is entitled to redeem the whole of two annas eight-pies share because the other heirs and descendants have expressed their willingness that she should do so. It is urged that the suit is in substance a suit by all the heirs to redeem the whole share. With this last plea we cannot agree. It would have been easy enough for the pro forma defendants, if they had so wished, to have turned themselves into plaintiffs and to have joined in the suit with the appellant. This they did not do. Our attention has been called to a decision of the Bombay High Court reported as Sakharam Narayan v. Gopal Lakshuman (1), which is somewhat in favour of the appellant. The appellant, however, is met at the forefront of this appeal by a series of rulings of this Court commencing from Kuray Mal v. Puran Mal (2) and ending with Munshi v. Daulat (3). It is clear, on the face of these rulings, that the plaintiff is entitled only to redeem the share which she owns in the mortgaged property, and that share is much less than two annas eight pies. We can see no good reason to differ from a long series of decisions which have prevailed in this Court, merely because in the year 1826 another Court has held otherwise, especially when the rulings of this Court are based on a ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council. In our opinion the decision of the Court below is quite correct. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a proceeding for the Probate of the Will of a person who died leaving three sons by a wife who predeceased him, and a widow with a son by her. The Will purported to leave the bulk of his property to the widow and her son. The application for Probate was made by two of the executors on the 2nd of February 1914. On the 13th July a petition of compromise was filed under which the widow on behalf of herself and her son agreed to divide the properties with the three sons by the first wife. On the same date the two executors who had applied for Probate withdrew their application. On the 11th of February 1915 a fresh application for Probate of this Will was made. In this application one of the executors who had applied before joined; the other applicant was another executor. An objection was taken on behalf of the sons of the first wife that the previous application for Probate having been withdrawn the executors were precluded by the provisions of Order XXIII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure from again applying for Probate. It is well settled by authority that an application for Probate cannot legally be disposed of by a compromise. The law imposes on the Court itself the duty of determining whether the Will is genuine or not. It is quite clear, therefore, that the Court acted improperly in permitting the executors to withdraw the application for Probate merely by reason of the compromise which was filed. So far as the question of the application of Order XXIII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure is concerned, that question has to be determined by reference to section 55 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881. That section says that the proceeding of the Court in relation to the granting of Probate shall be regulated, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, by the Code of Civil Procedure. Now the circumstances of a Probate case do not properly admit of the withdrawal of an application for Probate by an executor. Order XXIII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which says that a plaintiff may withdraw his suit or abandon a part of his claim, therefore, does not, in my opinion, apply to an application for Probate. It is the duty of an applicant for Probate to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the genuineness or otherwise of the Will. He fails in his duty if he does not obtain the finding of the Court on the Will: that being so, it is clear that the further provision in Order XXIII, rule 1, to the effect that if a plaintiff withdraws from a suit, he shall be precluded from instituting any fresh suit in respect of the same subject-matter, also does not apply. It is clearly undesirable that if any executor does improperly withdraw an application for Probate, he should be precluded from again undertaking the discharge of his duty in obtaining the finding of the Court on the genuineness of the Will. I would accordingly allow this appeal, set aside the judgment and order of the learned Judicial Commissioner and remand the case to him for a fresh decision. I am not prepared to express any opinion as to whether the parties will or will not be bound inter se by the petition of compromise which they filed, in so far as the disposal of the assets is concerned: but that has nothing to do with the question whether the Will is genuine or not, and upon that question the learned Judicial Commissioner must express an opinion.

The matter has been greatly delayed and we trust that it will be expedited as much as possible.

The appellants are entitled to their costs.

ATKINSON, J.—I agree.

The principle underlying section 28 of the Negotiable Instruments Act that if a promissory note is made payable by a person as agent of another, the latter is not liable personally on the note, applies also to the case of a payee. [p. 348, col. 1]

It is a well-known usage among Nattukottai Chetties to draw hundies, bills and promissory notes in the name of the agent of a firm represented by the firm's vilasam, and in such cases it is the firm indicated by the vilasam which is intended to be the payee and not the agent whose name appears on the instrument. [p. 347, col. 2.]

The question is entirely one of construction of a document. [p. 347, col. 2]

Where a person makes himself liable as a surety for a consolidated amount, the amounts themselves having been borrowed under several promissory notes from time to time, the cause of action as against the surety arises on each of the dates on which the sums borrowed under the several promissory notes become payable. Where the cause of action is separate the liability of the surety is also separate with respect to each of the promissory notes. [p. 348, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—The first objection raised in these appeals is that the plaintiff's firm was not entitled to maintain the suits, inasmuch as the promissory notes on which the suits are based are made out in the name of 'S.M.R.M.S.V. Raman Chetty', the contention being that the payee that is intended is Raman Chetty, the agent of the firm, indicated by the letters prefixed to his name, and not the firm itself. The question is entirely one of construction. We have to consider whether when the notes purport to be made payable to S.M.R.M.S.V. Raman Chetty what was intended was that the payee was to be the firm as indicated by the letters of the vilasam and represented by Raman Chetty the agent, or whether the payee was to be Raman Chetty who was in fact the agent of the plaintiff's firm. No evidence has been adduced in this case as to any particular usage obtaining among the Nattukottai Chetties, in describing the firm either as maker of the promissory note or as payee. But there is a decision, Mungamal Jesse Singh v. A.L.V.R.C.T. Firm (1), of Mr. Justice Wallis, as he then was, sitting on the Original Side of this Court where he held on the evidence adduced in that case that it was a well-known usage among Chetties to draw hundies, bills and promissory notes in this form and that in such cases, it is the firm indicated by the vilasam which is intended to be the payee and not the agent, though his name appears on the instrument. This decision was appealed from and confirmed by this Court in Original Side Appeal No. 58 of 1908. There is an allusion to this usage to be found also in Muthar Sahib Maraikar v. Kadir Sahib Maraikar (2), and the learned Subordinate Judge in this very case also holds it to be clear that the person indicated as the payee on these promissory notes is the firm and not Raman Chetty, the agent. We, therefore, read the promissory notes as meaning that the amounts were to be paid to the firm as represented by Raman Chetty.

But even if we were to read the notes as contended on behalf of the appellants, as if they were made payable to Raman Chetty the agent of the plaintiff's firm, that will not in any way help them. It has been laid down by the Full Bench in Koneti

RAMNATH SIL v. SIBA SUNDARI DEBYA.

Naicker v. Gopala Aiyar (3) that if a promissory note is made by a person as agent of another, the latter is not liable personally on the note. This is the effect of section 28 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and we think the principle underlying the section is applicable also in the case of a payee. We, therefore, hold that this objection to the suits is not tenable.

The next question which is argued by Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar is that inasmuch as the 1st defendant's liability was based on Exhibit E according to which he made himself liable to the extent of Rs. 15,000, the entire cause of action arose at the date of the institution of the Original Suit No. 16 of 1914 and the subsequent suits were barred by virtue of Order II, rule 2, corresponding to section 43 of the old Civil Procedure Code. It is contended that the liability of the 1st defendant under Exhibit E was a single liability with respect to the entire amount borrowed, though different amounts were borrowed from time to time under separate promissory notes. We do not think there is any force in this contention. The cause of action on each of these promissory notes was separate and that being so, the liability of the 1st defendant who stood in the position of a surety was also separate with respect to each of the promissory notes. The objection, therefore, fails.

It is also argued that the 1st defendant was not the partner of the firm, but we have not the slightest doubt that the finding of the Subordinate Judge on this point is right.

Another objection had been taken to the suits that inasmuch as the partnership of the defendants was not registered according to the Ordinance of Ceylon, they would not be liable for the debts contracted from the plaintiff. The Ordinance itself in express terms says that the absence of registration would not affect the liability of the partners to third persons.

Then it was argued that the Subordinate Judge ought to have appointed a Commissioner to take the accounts. But with respect to the amounts borrowed, there are the promissory notes on which the suits are based and there was no necessity for any accounts being taken since the amounts due upon the promissory notes were proved before the Subordinate Judge. All the appeals are dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

Landlord and tenant—Service tenure—Tenant refusing to perform service, consequences of—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 111, (b), (g)—Forfeiture of service tenure created before or after the passing of the Act.

A service tenure, whether created before or after the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, determines if the tenant refuses to render the requisite service and the landlord is thereupon entitled to re-enter without serving a notice to quit upon the tenant. [p. 349, cols. 1 & 2]

Clause (g) of section 111 of the Transfer of Property Act does not render it obligatory upon the lessor to serve a notice to quit upon a lessee who has forfeited his tenancy; a mere demand for possession is sufficient to determine the lease. [p. 350, col. 1.]

The plaintiffs instituted a suit for the ejectment of the defendants from land, which they held on condition that they would serve the plaintiffs as barbers and enjoy the land in consideration of their service, on the allegation that the defendants by refusing to perform the requisite service had forfeited the tenancy:

Held, that if the service tenure be assumed to have been created before the Transfer of Property Act came into operation, it was competent to the plaintiffs, on the service thus ceasing, to resume and take possession of the land without reference to the Court at all, but if, on the other hand, the tenancy be assumed to have been created after the Transfer of Property Act came into operation then the position of the parties must be determined with reference to the terms of section 111, clause (b) or clause (g), whichever was applicable to the case, and that in either case, the defendants were liable to be ejected without service of notice to quit. JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the defendants in an action in ejectment. The defendants, who are barbers by caste and profession, held the disputed land under the plaintiffs on condition that they would serve them as barbers and enjoy the land in consideration of their service. The plaintiffs seek to eject the defendants on the allegation that they have forfeited the tenancy, as since 1901 they have refused to perform the requisite service. The defendants urged that the tenancy is held at a money rent, that there has been no forfeiture and that they are entitled to a reasonable notice to quit, before they can be evicted. The Courts below have found on the merits in favour of the plaintiffs and have decreed the suit. In our opinion, that decree is manifestly right and cannot be successfully assailed.

As the origin of the tenancy is unknown, two alternative hypotheses have been placed before us. If the tenancy be assumed to have been created before the Transfer of Property Act came into operation, the position of the defendants must be determined with reference to the law as it stood at that time. Now, it was ruled by a Full Bench of the Sudder Court in the case of Sreesh Chunder v. Madhub Mocher (1) that where the defendant held land for the performance of certain services, he was not entitled to continue in possession when he failed to perform the services and that it was competent to the grantor, on the service thus ceasing, to resume and take possession of the land without reference to the Court at all. This view was confirmed subsequently in the cases of Hurrogobind Raha v. Ramrutno Dey (2), Makbul Hossain v. Ameer Sheikh (3) and Ansar Ali Jemadar v. C. E. Grey (4). Consequently if the law as it stood before the Transfer of Property Act is applied to the case before us, the defendants are liable to be ejected without notice, as they have refused to perform the requisite service. If, on the other hand, the tenancy is assumed to have been created after the Transfer of Property Act came into operation the position of the parties must be determined with reference to the terms of section 111. Under clause (b) of that section, a lease of immovable property determines, where such time (that is, the time limited thereby) is limited conditionally on the happening of some event, by the happening of such event. Under clause (g) a lease of immovable property determines by forfeiture in case the lessee breaks an express condition which provides that on breach thereof, the lessor may re enter or the lease shall become void, if the lessor does some act showing his intention to determine the lease. In our opinion the case falls either within clause (b) or clause (g). A service tenant holds the land on condition that if he refuses to render service the lease shall determine, and thereupon the landlord shall be entitled to re-enter. There can thus be no doubt that if a service tenant renounces his character as service tenant, by claiming to hold the lands at money or produce rent, and denies the title of the landlord to resume the lands, the lease to him determines and no notice is necessary to eject him. It is also plain that if clause (g) be held applicable, the lessors did, in the present case, signify, prior to the institution of the suit, their intention to determine the lease. In 1908, they instituted a suit to eject the defendants on the ground that their tenancy had been forfeited by reason of their refusal to render service: that suit was withdrawn, with liberty reserved to institute a fresh suit on the same cause of action. This was sufficient notice of intent to forfeit: Serjeant v. Nash Field & Co. (5), Grimwood v. Moss (6), Jones v. Carter (7). As was explained in the case of Anandamoyee v. Meghu Mahton (9). It is consequently plain that whether the tenancy was created before or after the Transfer of Property Act came into force, the defendants are liable to be ejected without service of notice to quit.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), s. 80—Hand-note 'payable on demand,' whether carries interest—'On demand,' meaning of—Demand, whether necessary before institution of suit—'After demand,' meaning of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VIII, r. 6—Set-off, principles governing.

Where a hand-note is silent as to the rate of interest payable, the lender is entitled, under section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, to interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the date when the money ought to have been paid. [p. 350, col. 2.]

The words 'payable on demand' have a legal meaning and sense, which convey that the note is payable on the date of its execution. In such a case no demand is necessary prior to the suit. [p. 351, col. 2.]

If, however, the words used are 'after demand', then a demand becomes necessary before a suit is instituted. [p. 351, col. 2.]

In a suit for the recovery of money the defendant is not allowed to set off against the plaintiff's demand any sum which is not an ascertained sum legally recoverable and the claim with respect to which does not arise out of the same transaction. [p. 352, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—The plaintiff sues the defendant for recovery of the principal sum of Rs. 1,109 on foot of a hand-note, dated the 2nd of November 1910. There is no dispute that the amount of the principal stated in the note of hand is due and owing by the defendant to the plaintiff. The note of hand, however, is quite silent as to the payment of interest. The hand-note is, in terms, a hand-note payable on demand. The plaintiff, in his plaint, in paragraph 2, claims interest at the rate of 12 per cent. upon the principal sum advanced to the defendant. The learned Judge, however, held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any interest whatever, because in the hand-note interest was not provided for. It is contended before us that the learned Judge was wrong in arriving at that conclusion in point of law, because, even though the hand-note contained no provision as to interest, yet under section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, XXVI of 1881, the plaintiff would be entitled to interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the date on which the amount secured by the hand-note ought to have been paid. The learned Judge was not referred to section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act; because I feel sure that if his attention had been directed to the provisions of that Act he would have passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff for interest at the rate of 6 per cent.

The only question of difficulty which arises in this case is the time from which the rate of interest began to run. I think that it must be admitted, having regard to the authorities, that where a hand-note is silent as to the rate of interest payable, under section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act the lender is entitled to interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the date when the money ought to have been paid. The case reported as Ghansham Lalji v. Ram Narain (1) and also the case reported as Basanti Bibi v. Sheo Mangal

(1) 29 A. 33; 11 C. W. N. 105, 17 M. L. J. 35; 4 A. L. J. 29; 1 M. L. T. 427; 9 Bom. L. R. 1; 5 C. L. J. 7 (P. C.).

BISHUN CHAND v. AUDH BIHARI LAL.

Farshad (2) undoubtedly favour that construction. There is a case reported as Bhupati Ram v. Sourendra Mohun Tagore (3), which seems to take a different view, but in that case the learned Judge who decided the case never considered or discussed the effect of section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. Therefore, we consider that on the true construction of section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act interest was payable on the note in suit.

The next question is, from what date the interest became due. The note of hand expressly purports to be a note of hand "payable on demand" and it is contended by Mr. Mullick that where a hand-note is payable on demand it is payable immediately on its execution; and Mr. Mullick relies, in support of his argument, upon a case reported as Perumal Ayyan v. Alagirisami Bhagavathar (4), and at page 248 their Lordships say: "The words 'on demand' must, we think, be regarded as a technical expression equivalent to 'immediately' or 'forthwith'. That, we think, was the intention of the parties." That case was considered in the case reported as Perianna Goundan v. Muthuvira Goundan (5) and their Lordships say: "There can be no doubt but that, under the general law, money lent, payable on demand, is due from the date of the loan; in other words, there is a cause of action on the date of the loan." To the like effect are the authorities in England; and the law may be summed up, according to the decision of Blackburn, J., as follows:—"In general, where money is payable on demand, the law holds that the debtor is bound to find out the creditor and pay him; and this the debtor is liable to do at once. Therefore, a promissory note 'payable on demand' is payable at the instant the note is made. No demand is necessary prior to an action." The authorities for this proposition laid down by Blackburn, J., are to be found in Norton v. Ellam (6), Maltby v. Murrells (7) and George, In re, Francis v. Bruce (8). Therefore, the words "payable on demand" have a legal meaning and sense which convey that the note is payable on the date of its execution. It must be remembered that the words "on demand" are distinct and separate from the words "after demand". If the words used are "after demand", then a demand is necessary; but if the words are "on demand", then no demand is necessary. Accordingly we are of opinion that the note in suit was liable to interest as and from the 2nd of November 1910, that is the date on which it was executed; and that the plaintiff is entitled in this case to interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 2nd of November 1910 until the date of realization of the debt.

The defendant, as against the principal sum and interest due from him to the plaintiff, seeks to set off certain sums which he claims as the value of his services rendered to the plaintiff as a Pleader. He sets out in his claim various items, ranging alphabetically from A to H, which aggregate in all to nearly Rs. 2,000, and he seeks to have the full sum set off as against the plaintiff's claim. As a matter of fact, however, the defendant is not entitled to claim the entire sum set out in his claim. He is only entitled to a share jointly with other Pleaders who were associated with him in the cases in which he represented the plaintiff. He is thus only entitled to claim a fractional part of the amounts shown by him. Therefore it can in no sense be said that the defendant's claim is for an ascertained amount within the meaning of Order VIII, rule 6. Indeed that his claim is not for an ascertained sum is demonstrated by the fact that the learned Judge had himself to ascertain and declare the proportionate share of the sum claimed by the defendant to which he (the defendant) was in fact entitled. The learned Judge has assessed this share at Rs. 176-9-0; but the fact that the learned Judge has arrived at this conclusion does not entitle the defendant to say that he is legally entitled to recover this sum without giving proof that it was legally recoverable at the date of the institution of the suit. The learned Judge has come to the conclusion that Rs. 176-9-0 is due to the defendant by the plaintiff for the value of services rendered by him as a professional legal gentleman. But we think that the plaintiff cannot claim this sum as a legal or an equitable set-off; and certainly not as an equitable set off because the claim does not arise out of the same transaction. We have carefully considered the effect of the law laid down in the case reported as Diltor Koer v. Karkhoo Singh (9), and we are of opinion that the defendant in this case is not entitled in point of law to the set-off which he claims. Therefore, strictly speaking, the decree of the lower Court should be varied and the defendant's claim for a set-off should be dismissed. However, it appearing to us that something must be due by the plaintiff to the defendant for services rendered, we threw out the suggestion that the plaintiff as an honest man should pay an honest debt, more especially as the creditor is a Pleader who is usually one of the most deserving creditors in the world. However, Mr. Mullick had some diffidence in acceding to our suggestion; but we consider that it is desirable that this litigation should, if possible, be brought to a termination. Therefore, although we think that the defendant is not entitled to a set-off in point of law, nevertheless we think that we should, on the principle of justice, equity and good conscience, settle this litigation on a fair and equitable basis; and we would, therefore, allow the defendant, as against the plaintiff, credit for the amount to which he is entitled for services rendered by him as a Pleader and we fix this sum at the figure arrived at by the learned Judge, viz., Rs. 176-9-0. We accordingly set aside the decree of the lower Court and declare that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the full sum claimed by him by way of principal, viz., Rs. 1,109; and that he is further entitled to interest on this sum at the rate of 6 per cent per annum as and from the 2nd of November 1910 until the date of realization. As against this sum of principal and interest the defendant will get credit for Rs. 176-9-0 as and for the value of services rendered by him to the plaintiff plus Rs. 400, being the sum already paid by him to the plaintiff, i.e., in all Rs. 570.

The appeal is accordingly allowed with costs.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 15—Coercion—Threat to commit suicide, whether 'coercion'—Suicide, whether 'act forbidden by the Penal Code'—To the prejudice of any person whatever', meaning of—Document, execution of, under threat of suicide, validity of—Penal Code (XIV of 1860), ss. 305, 306, 309.

Per Wallis, C. J., and Seshagiri Aiyar, J., (Oldfield, J., dissenting).—A threat to commit suicide, in consequence of which a document is executed by a person, is the threatening to commit an 'act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code' and amounts to 'coercion' within the meaning of section 15 of the Contract Act, and the document executed in pursuance of the threat is invalid and inoperative. [p. 353, col. 1; p. 355, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Wallis, C. J.—It is impossible to hold that an act which it is made punishable to abet or attempt is not forbidden by the Penal Code, especially as the absence of any section punishing the act itself is due to the fact that suicide is, in the nature of things, beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. [p. 353, col. 2.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Though there is no provision in the Indian Penal Code which forbids in terms the commission of suicide, there can be no doubt that the intention of the Legislature is to forbid such an act simply because a man, by committing the act, is beyond the reach of the law. [p. 353, col. 1.]

The word 'prejudice' in section 15 of the Contract Act does not mean mere sentimental prejudice. Some legal injury must flow before a person can be said to be 'prejudiced' under the section. [p. 353, cols. 1 & 2.]

A wife who executes a document in consequence of the husband's threat that he would commit suicide is prejudicially affected by the threat. [p. 353, col. 2.]

Per Oldfield, J.—Section 15 of the Contract Act should be strictly construed, and the act of prohibition not being expressly forbidden by the Penal Code, the prohibition cannot be inferred from the prohibition of attempts to commit it. An attempt

Mr. G. Venkataramiah, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—It has been found by both Courts that the deed in question was obtained by coercion, the coercion consisting in a threat by the fifth witness for the plaintiffs to his wife and son that he would commit suicide if they did not execute the document.

It is easy to set up such a defence and the evidence in support of it should, therefore, be very closely scrutinized before it is held to be made out. Here it has been found as a fact and we are not at liberty to interfere with the finding on second appeal.

The case now comes before us on a Letters Patent appeal owing to a difference of opinion between Sadasiva Aiyar and Moore, J.J., as to whether the facts as found amounted to coercion within the meaning of section 15 of the Indian Contract Act.

The point mainly argued before us was that suicide was not an "act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code" within the meaning of the section. With this I cannot agree. At Common Law suicide was a form of homicide. "Homicide properly so called", says Hawkins (Pleas of the Crown, Book I, Chapter 9), "is either against a man's own life or that of another." Wilful suicide was felony, and on a finding that the suicide was felo de se his chattels were forfeited to the Crown like those of other convicted felons. In section 299 of the Indian Penal Code the offence of culpable homicide is defined in terms which are sufficiently wide to cover deliberate suicide, which is dealt with by Mr. Nelson in his Indian Penal Code as a species of unlawful homicide, though, of course, section 302 and the following sections which prescribe the punishment for the various kinds of homicide are only applicable to living offenders. These sections are immediately followed by sections 305 and 306, which make abetment of suicide punishable with death in some circumstances and with lesser penalties in others. Then after dealing in sections 307 and 308 with attempts to commit murder and to commit culpable homicide, the Code proceeds in section 309 to provide for attempts to commit suicide. I find it impossible to hold that an act which it is made punishable to abet or attempt is not forbidden by the Indian Penal Code, especially as the absence of any section punishing the act itself is due to the fact that the suicide is in the nature of things beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, and it is no longer thought desirable to inflict a vicarious punishment on those who come after him by forfeiting his goods to the Crown.

As to the second point, the act threatened must be "to the prejudice of any person whatever," and would cover threats to a wife to murder her husband or to a son to murder his father. Here the threat was by the husband and father to kill himself, which must be taken to be an act to his own prejudice, which seems to me sufficient to satisfy the section. I may add that I think the threatened act would also be directly to the prejudice of the wife, as it must be taken to be to the prejudice of any wife to deprive her of her husband, especially of a Hindu wife who thereby incurs all the disabilities of a Hindu widow. For the same reason, I think the act must be taken to be to the prejudice of the son. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

Under section 33 of the Letters Patent the appeal is dismissed with costs.

OLDFIELD, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from the learned Chief Justice and therefore deal with the case at length.

The question is whether a threat to commit suicide is a threat to commit an act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code within the meaning of section 15, Indian Contract Act; and it is conceded that it is not forbidden either directly or in the sense that a penalty is provided for it. It, therefore, can be regarded as forbidden only by implication. It is accordingly in place to consider whether section 15 can be construed by implication or should be read strictly.

Section 15 has given rise to few decisions, and to none in which the policy of the portion we are concerned with has been defined. No definition of that policy has been suggested before us, and advisedly. For it would be hard to argue that any general policy is in question, when the coercive character of an act depends on the applicability to it of a Statute, which, though wide, does not enumerate acts criminal in India exhaustively, which (as the illustration shows) need not have been enacted at all or need not have been in force at the date or place in question and which might make conduct punishable, although it would be so under no law binding on those concerned or of which they could even be presumed to have known. The test thus provided may commend itself as definite, but can be regarded only as arbitrary and not as intended to promote any general policy by reference to which a liberal construction can be supported. Taking this view, I am bound to scrutinize respondents' arguments closely.

The first is that a threat to commit suicide is indistinguishable from one to attempt to do so and that such an attempt is forbidden by section 309, Indian Penal Code, which penalizes it. The answer is that threats of these two descriptions are distinguishable, unless the word "attempt" is used throughout the argument in its ordinary sense as equivalent to "endeavour" and not, as it must be in the second place, where it occurs, in the legal sense, in which it is used in sections 305 and 511. Further if the word is used in its legal sense throughout, a threat to attempt to commit suicide is not only different from one to commit suicide, but is, like other threats to commit an attempt, a contradiction in terms. For an attempt in the legal sense can be recognized as such only after the criminal's intention has been frustrated, not when it is expressed; that is, when the threat is made. The remaining contention relied on is that the Code implicitly forbids suicide, because in sections 306 and 309 it explicitly forbids abetment of it and attempts to commit it. But this will advance the argument, only if it corresponds with some general principle; and it does not as regards abetment. For, apart from the cases of abetment of children and lunatics, it is not suggested that acts done without guilty knowledge or intention (and, therefore, innocently), but which nevertheless can be abetted under section 108, explanation 3, are forbidden. The principle, if there is one, is, therefore, sustainable only subject to these exceptions. But, even so, reference to it is useless. For it is not shown that it can be tested by application to any instance, except the case of suicide, with which we are concerned; and there is no more security for its validity when such test is impossible, than for the validity of respondents' argument as applied to that case alone.

Respondents must, therefore, succeed, if at all, on the single and direct contention that in the case of suicide a prohibition can be inferred from the prohibition of attempts to commit it; and with all respect, having decided in favour of a strict construction of section 15, Indian Contract Act, I cannot accept it. No doubt the only species of prohibition employed in the Code, the specification of a penalty, would be useless in this case. But it does not follow that the failure to employ the other, direct prohibition, or to make provision for the case of suicide in the Contract Act was due to inadvertence and that the omission should be supplied by inference. For it is possible that provision was omitted deliberately, because cases for its application would be rare and their truth difficult to establish, the party alleged to be coerced having usually easier means of preventing the accomplishment of the threat than by entering into the agreement sought to be avoided.

Holding that respondents cannot succeed on section 15, I turn to section 16 on which they also rely. In this connection, the threat of suicide is irrelevant, since Swami, who made it, was not a party to the contract; and there is no finding of fact, which would support any exercise of undue influence by the parties to the contract, appellants. This plea, therefore, fails, MAHENDRA CHANDRA DATTA v. ABHOY CHARAN SARMA.

As the majority of the Court would dismiss the appeal with reference to section 15, respondents' other contentions have not been heard. On the view I take it would be necessary to consider them before the appeal could be disposed of.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree with the judgment of the learned Chief Justice.

I do not think that the evidence in this case is sufficient to warrant a finding on the question of undue influence. On the question of coercion, although I had some doubts in the beginning, I have come to the conclusion that the facts do bring the case within section 15 of the Indian Contract Act. Mr. Patanjali Sastri argued that threatening to commit suicide is not forbidden by the Indian Penal Code. A man who commits suicide goes unpunished, because the law cannot reach him, and not because the offence is not forbidden. The Code makes a person who abets the committing of suicide punishable. It also reaches a man who attempts to commit suicide. Although, therefore, there is no provision in the Indian Penal Code which forbids in terms the commission of suicide, there can be no doubt that the intention of the Legislature is to forbid such an act. I agree with Mr. Venkatarama Aiyah that the term "any act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code" is wider than the term "punishable by the Indian Penal Code." Simply because a man escapes punishment, it does not follow that the act is not forbidden by the Indian Penal Code. For example, a lunatic or a minor may not be punished. This does not show that their criminal acts are not forbidden by the Indian Penal Code. On the same analogy, a man who commits suicide escapes punishment because by committing the act, he is out of the reach of the law. Where the abetment of it and the attempt to do it are both made punishable by the Indian Penal Code, I am prepared to hold that the act itself is one forbidden by the Indian Penal Code.

The second contention of the learned Vakil was, that the threat to commit suicide could not have prejudiced the plaintiff. I agree with him that mere sentimental prejudice is not what the law contemplates. As pointed out in Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (1), some legal injury must flow in order that the man may be said to have been prejudiced. See also Clark v. London General Omnibus Company, Limited (2). Accepting this test, I am unable to hold that the wife to whom the threat was addressed by a husband that he would commit suicide in case she does not execute a document, is not prejudicially affected by such a threat. In my opinion, the possibility of the husband dying leaving the wife and the child uncared for is sufficient in the eye of the law to furnish the ground of prejudice. On this ground I agree with Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar in thinking that Exhibit A was brought about by the use of coercion and that it should be set aside.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Obiter.—A purchaser under such a sale is entitled to sue in ejectment. [p. 357, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Sylhet, dated the 17th December 1914.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Sasadhar Roy (Senior), for the Appellants.—We have always denied the title of Jagannath Misra, husband of Annapurna. The respondent has got to prove that the land belonged to her husband and that she inherited it from him, before any presumption can arise that she had only a life-interest. Her possession and title being proved, it should be presumed that she had an absolute right, so no question of legal necessity can arise. I rely on the Privy Council ruling reported as Diwan Ran Bijai Bahadur Singh v. Indarpal Singh (1). Moreover, sale by her, assuming that the property sold was her husband's property, is not absolutely void.

Even if it be assumed that she had only a life-interest, the purchaser from her has a good title, so long as the sale is not set aside by the reversioners or those who claim through the reversioners.

Babu Hemendra Kumar Das, for the Respondents.—It was practically admitted that Annapurna's husband was the owner of the properties. See the kabalas by his daughter's sons. The title of the respondent by adverse possession has been made out. The reversioner was a party to this proceeding, but he has compromised the matter with the respondent and has no objection to the respondent getting the compensation.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a proceeding under the Land Acquisition Act and the question involved in the appeal is whether the appellant or the respondent should get the compensation awarded by the Collector.

A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the respondent that the reference under section 18 was barred by limitation, inasmuch as it was not made within six weeks from the date of the Collector's award. It is contended that, as a Mukhtear appeared at some stage of the proceedings, it must be taken that the appellant was represented before the Collector at the time when the Collector made his award. It appears, however, that some time before the date of the award, the Collector passed an order that the appellant should go to the Civil Court; and it does not appear that the Mukhtear took any further part in the proceedings before the Collector. That being so, the appellant was not present or represented before the Collector at the time when he made his award. The reference having been made within six months of the award was within time under section 18, sub-section (2), clause (b). The preliminary objection is accordingly overruled.

The dispute between the parties relates to compensation for five plots of land, namely, plots Nos. 14, 19, 20, 58 and 26. So far as plot No. 26 is concerned, it appears that, after the delivery of possession thereof to the appellants' predecessor, who purchased it at an execution sale, the respondent preferred a claim which was successful and no suit was brought within the period of limitation. The claim, so far as this plot is concerned, was not pressed in argument before the Court below and must accordingly be disallowed.

With regard to the remaining four plots, the appellant claims to have purchased them in execution of a decree against Bimala Sundari, widow of Dinonath, in respect of debt due by the latter. The respondent, on the other hand, claims title to one half of them by right of adverse possession, and the other half by virtue of one Baikuntha "having given up the same in his favour." He says that these lands originally belonged to one Jagannath and that, after the death of Jagannath and his widow Annapurna, they were inherited by their daughter's sons Ratanmoni and Banku Behari, that Banku Behari sold his 8 annas to Baikuntha and that it was this Baikuntha who gave up the 8 annas in his favour. So far as Ratanmoni's 8-annas share is concerned, the respondent claims it by right of adverse possession.

The learned District Judge has found that neither party has been able to prove his title, and, as the respondent was in possession, he disallowed the claim of the appellant. The learned Judge seems to have proceeded upon the assumption that the properties originally belonged to Jagannath. That, however, was not the case of the appellant, and there is really no evidence on the side of the respondent to show that the properties originally belonged to Jagannath. The witnesses who deposed on the point have no personal knowledge about the matter, and we must hold that the respondent has failed to prove that Jagannath was entitled to the lands. But assuming that Jagannath had any title to the lands and that they descended to his daughter's sons, Ratanmoni and Banku Behari, we do not think that the title of the respondent has been made out. As stated above, so far as Banku Behari's share is concerned, all that the respondent said in his written statement in the Court below was that Baikuntha had given up his right in his favour, and that throws considerable doubt upon the evidence adduced by him to prove that there was a purchase of the 8-annas share from Baikuntha.

Then, as regards the share of Ratanmoni, the respondent claims his title by adverse possession for over twelve years. He himself in his deposition said that he had been in possession for about eleven or twelve years and one of his witnesses, Dinonath Sarma, said that it was for fourteen or fifteen years. But Dinonath is his brother-in-law and he went further than the respondent himself as to the period for which the respondent was in possession. As stated above the respondent in his written statement claimed title to Ratanmoni's share by adverse possession for twelve years but adduced evidence to show that he had also purchased Ratanmoni's share. That evidence cannot be accepted and we think that neither the purchase from Ratanmoni nor from Baikuntha has been satisfactorily proved.

The learned Judge relied upon the fact that the respondent was in possession; and it is contended before us that the respondent should be awarded the compensation unless the appellant can show a better title. The learned Judge was of opinion that the properties belonged to Jagannath and that, if the appellant purchased the properties from Annapurna, that purchase was not binding upon the reversionary heirs of Jagannath or persons claiming under him,

But, in the first place, it has not been shown that the properties belonged to Jagannath; and, secondly, even if the properties belonged to Jagannath and were inherited by his widow Annapurna, the purchase by the appellant or his vendor from Annapurna is not void. It is only voidable at the instance of the reversioners or persons claiming under them. That is well settled. See Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (2). A purchaser from a Hindu widow, although he is not able to show either legal necessity or consent of the reversioner, is entitled to sue in ejectment. See Kishori Pal v. Sheikh Bhushai Bhuiya (3). We have already found that the respondent has not proved any title derived from the reversioners of Jagannath, assuming that the title belonged to him. That being so, he cannot question the title of the appellant even if he is taken to have purchased from Jagannath's widow Annapurna. He, however, claims his title through Dinanath and it is not disputed that he purchased the interest of Dinanath at the execution sale. In any view of the matter, we think that the appellant has proved his title to the four plots and that he is entitled to the compensation in respect of them.

The respective values of plot No. 28 and of the other four plots do not appear from the record before us. We accordingly send the case back to the lower Court in order that the value of plot No. 28 may be ascertained and the compensation awarded in respect of that plot may be given to the respondent Abhoy Charan Sarma out of the five plots, the subject-matter of the appeal, and that the compensation in respect of the other plots Nos. 14, 19, 20 and 58 may be given to the appellant. The parties will get their costs in both the Courts in proportion to their success. We assess the hearing fee in this Court at five gold mohurs.

Appeal allowed; Case lent back.

Nos. 1, 2, 4 AND 5—RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage—Document, construction of—Usufructuary hypothecation bond—Hypothecation clause, claim on, barred—Redemption, suit for—Rights of mortgagor and mortgagee—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), ss. 3, 28.

A mortgage-bond, entitled usufructuary hypothecation bond, for Rs. 3,000 provided that interest on the moiety of the amount advanced would be payable out of the usufruct and that interest at one per cent. per month would be paid on the balance by the mortgagor. The final provision was that both sums were to be paid in a lump on the same day 10 years afterwards. After the right to sue on the hypothecation clause became barred, the mortgagor sued to redeem the mortgage and claimed that he was entitled to possession of the entire property on payment of Rs. 1,500 only:

Held, (1) that the document constituted only one mortgage transaction; [p. 258, col. 2.]

(2) that section 28 of the Limitation Act could not apply to the case and that the mortgagor was not entitled to redeem without discharging the whole debt. [p. 359, col. 1.]

Kesar Kunwar v. Kashi Ram, 30 Ind. Cas. 777; 37 A. 634; 13 A. L. J. 889 and Athan Kutti v. Matavil Illoth Sutarjanam, 37 Ind. Cas. 756; (1917) M. W. N. 9; 5 L. W. 461; 32 M. L. J. 317, distinguished.

The provisions of the Limitation Act should be construed strictly. Limitation is not extinction and the bar created by it does not operate to discharge a debt except in the particular circumstances of section 28. [p. 359, col. 1.]

The limitation of the mortgagee's right to recover must not be read as a good plea to be urged by a mortgagor endeavouring to redeem, and unless the mortgagee is compelled to bring a suit within the meaning of section 3 of the Limitation Act, he is entitled to set up every claim in defence that he has in law to support the debt which still remains due. [p. 359, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

NAPIER, J.—In my opinion, the view taken by the Munsif and upheld by the District

Judge that the right of redemption can only be exercised on payment of the whole of the mortgage amount is correct. The mortgage-bond, Exhibit A, is perfectly easy to understand. A sum of Rs. 3,000 was borrowed. The property was obviously not of sufficient value to discharge the interest which the mortgagee required from the usufruct and so the usufruct was to be applied to the payment of only half the interest. With respect to the interest on the balance of Rs. 1,500, the mortgage is treated as a hypothecation bond and the interest is calculated at one per cent. a month. Then the final provision is that both sums are to be paid in one lump on the same day, 10 years afterwards, and the bond is entitled "usufructuary hypothecation bond."

Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar has sought to make two mortgages out of this transaction and suggests that the fact that these two mortgages are contained in one document does not make any difference. In my opinion it is, as it purports to be, one mortgage with provisions in it which are rendered necessary by the fact that the whole of the interest chargeable cannot be discharged by the usufruct.

Now the plaintiff seeks to redeem the property. Admittedly he cannot redeem without paying the whole amount that is due; and it is not disputed that, apart from any question of limitation, the whole amount which he claims is due: but it is said that he cannot be compelled to pay Rs. 1,500 because if the defendant had brought a suit to recover that amount of Rs. 1,500 in respect of what may be called the hypothecation clause of the document, the suit would be barred.

Reliance is placed on two cases, Kesar Kunwar v. Kashi Ram (1) and Athan Kutti v. Matavil Illoth Sutarjanam (2). I do not think that these cases have any bearing on the narrow points we have to decide here. In both of them there were two documents and two distinct transactions and to my mind that is a quite sufficient distinction between those cases and this and it is not necessary for us to consider what would be the position if there were in this case two documents and to go into the rather difficult subject of consolidation. The short answer to the appellant's case is that the Limitation Act must be construed strictly and that limitation is not extinction, except in the particular circumstances of section 28. Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar has not argued that section 28 applies to this case and we do not think that such an argument could be put forward with any chance of success. We are, therefore, left with section 3: "Subject to the provisions contained in sections 4 to 25 every suit instituted shall be dismissed." Now that is the sole provision and it is accepted law in this Court, and I think in every other Court in India that the bar of limitation does not operate to discharge. For this proposition it is only necessary to quote Subrahmania Ayyar v. Poovan (3) and Subrahmania Aiyar v. Gopala Aiyar (4). If, therefore, the debt is not extinguished and if the sole effect of the Statute is that the mortgagee could not have brought a suit to recover that amount and if it is provided by Statute that a mortgagor cannot redeem without discharging the whole of the debt, there is to my mind an end of the contention of the appellant. And this is, I think, the true view of the case. Our attention has been called to two English cases, one of them specifically dealing with the rights and liabilities of a mortgagor. They are Edmunds v. Waugh (5) and Marshfield, In re; Marshfield v. Hutchings (6). The principle stated there, that the limitation of the mortgagee's right to recover must not be read as a good plea to be urged by a mortgagor endeavouring to redeem, covers this case and, in my opinion, unless the mortgagee is compelled to bring a suit within the meaning of section 3 he is entitled to set up every claim that he has in law, to support the debt which still remains due.

I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

AYLING, J.—I agree.

Principal and agent—Agent's obligation to render accounts, scope of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 64, 89, 115—Suit for recovery of money found due on accounts taken and adjusted—Limitation—"Moveable property", whether includes money.

Where the accounts of an agent have been taken and adjusted and a specific sum has been found due from the agent to the principal, the principal becomes entitled to sue forthwith for its recovery and the position is not altered, even if the agent continues thereafter to hold his office as agent of that principal. A suit of this description falls under Article 64 or Article 115 of the Limitation Act. [p. 360, col. 2.]

Where accounts have been rendered by an agent, Article 89 of the Limitation Act has no application to a suit by the principal against the agent for recovery of money found due on such accounts, as the suit contemplated by Article 89 is a suit in which accounts have to be taken. [p. 360, col. 2.]

The obligation of an agent to render an account of his agency and to account for money received by him is not merely confined to rendering of accounts of what has been done with the moneys, but includes also the payment of any balance which might be found due from him upon taking accounts. JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal in a suit by a principal for recovery of a sum of money from his agent. The plaintiff claims three sums from the defendant, namely, Rs. 785-14 found due on adjustment of the accounts of 1311, Rs. 1867-2-9 alleged to be due on the unadjusted accounts of 1314, and Rs. 661-5-6 said to have been advanced to the defendant. The agency ceased on the 15th October 1907 and the suit was instituted on the 4th November 1910; but in this connection, it is to be borne in mind that the Court was closed on account of the annual vacation from the 2nd October to the 3rd November 1910. The District Judge has found, with regard to the sum of Rs. 661-5-6, that as the defendant has already accounted for it, the plaintiff is not entitled to relief in respect thereof. As regards the sum of Rs. 1,537-2-9, the District Judge has found that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, and that no questions of limitation arises, as the suit was brought within three years from the date of termination of the agency as required by Article 89 of the Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. The only question in controversy, consequently, is, whether the claim for Rs. 785-14 found due on adjustment of the accounts of the year 1311 is barred by limitation. The case for the plaintiff is that the suit in respect of this claim is governed by Article 89, while the contention of the defendant is that Article 64 applies to this matter. In our opinion, Article 89 has no possible application in so far as this portion of the claim is concerned.

Article 89 provides that a suit by a principal against his agent for moveable property received by the latter and not accounted for must be instituted within three years from the date when the account is, during the continuance of the agency, demanded and refused, or where no such demand is made, when the agency terminates. If attention is confined only to the first column of this Article, the contention of the appellant may seem plausible; for the argument is that this is a suit by a principal against his agent; it is for recovery of moveable property, because it has been ruled that the expression "moveable property" includes money; and it is further a suit for recovery of money which has been received by the agent and has not been accounted for, because the agent has not paid to the principal the sum claimed. Now, it need not be disputed, as was explained by Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., in Kalee Kishen Paul Chowdhry v. Musammatt Juggut Tara (1), that the obligation of an agent to render an account of his agency and to account for money received by him, is not confined merely to rendering of accounts of what has been done with the moneys, but includes also the payment of any balance which might be found due from him upon taking accounts. But when the first column of Article 89 is read along with the third column, it becomes plain that the suit contemplated by Article 89 is a suit in which accounts have to be taken. The first alternative mentioned in the third column refers to a case where the principal has demanded an account during the continuance of the agency and has met with a refusal; the second alternative refers to a case where an account has not been demanded and presumably has not been rendered. Where an account has been rendered, Article 89 has thus no application. In our opinion, it is plain that where accounts have been taken and adjusted, and a specific sum has been found due from the agent to the principal, the principal becomes entitled to sue forthwith for recovery of that money: Nobin Chunder Sahoo v. Suroop Chunder Dass (2), Bissessur Gir v. Sree Kishen Shaha Chowdhry (3); Umedchand Hukamchand v. Sha Bulakidas Lalchand (4) and Dukhi Sahu v. Mahomed Bikhru (5); and the position is not altered, even if the agent continues thereafter to hold his office as agent of that principal. To a suit for the enforcement of a claim of this description, for the recovery of a specific sum found due on adjustment of accounts, Article 64 or Article 115 applies. Article 64 applies to a suit for money payable to the plaintiff as money found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff on accounts settled between them. Such a suit has to be instituted within three years from the date when the accounts are stated in writing, signed by the defendant or his agent duly authorised in this behalf. There is, however, an important exception to this rule, namely, in the case where the debt is, by a simultaneous agreement in writing signed by the defendant or his duly authorised agent, made payable at a future time, the period runs from the date when such time arrives. In the case before us, it has not been suggested that when the accounts of 1311 were adjusted, there was a simultaneous agreement, in writing and signed as required by the Statute, for payment of the sum due at a future time. Consequently, time ran against the plaintiff from the date when the accounts were adjusted and the statement signed, and as the suit has been brought more than three years after such date, the claim is clearly barred by limitation. On the other hand, if we hold, as has been done in some cases [Laycock v. Pickles (6), Nahanibai v. Nathu Bhanu (7), Tribhoran Gangaram v. Amina (8), Zulfikar Husain v. Munna Lal (9), Amuthu v. Muthayya (10)], that the expression "account stated" applies only where there are reciprocal demands, though a more popular signification was accepted in Dukhi Sahu v. Mahomed Bikhru (5) and Manjunatha Kamti v. Devamma (11), it is plain that Article 115 is applicable, and in that view also, the claim is barred by limitation: Jalim Singh v. Choonee Lal (12).

An ingenious attempt has been made to induce us to hold that the principal appropriated the sum due from the collection of subsequent years. There is no foundation for this contention. If the sum found due on adjustment had, as a matter of fact, been paid by the agent to the principal, the plaintiff would not have included a claim for that sum in his plaint. On the other hand, it is plain that the accounts for the different years were separately adjusted and no claim has been instituted for the years 1312 and 1313, because, presumably, upon accounts taken for those years, nothing was found due from the agent to the principal. The suit is, in substance, for recovery of money found due on adjustment of accounts of the year 1311 and alleged to be due for the year 1314. In respect of the latter claim, the suit is governed by Article 89, as the accounts have to be taken; in respect of the former claim, the suit is for recovery of a debt found due on adjustment of accounts and is governed by Article 64 or Article 115. We hold, accordingly, that the view taken by the District Judge is correct and that his decree must be affirmed. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ODDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 252 OF 1914*.

January 30, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Lindsay, J. C.

MAZHAR ALI KHAN, DEAD, AND AFTER HIS DEATH Musammatt SIRAJ-UN-NISA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS
versus

ALI ASGHAR—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Construction of document—Sale-deed, interpretation of—Vendor and purchaser—Money left with vendee for payment to mortgagee—Redemption, no attempt made by vendee for—Mortgagee's suit decreed—Decree satisfied by vendee—Vendee, position of.

On the sale of an immoveable property a portion of the sale-consideration was left with the vendee for payment to the mortgagee of the said property. The sale-deed provided that if the money so left with the vendee fell short of the sum actually due to the mortgagee the vendor was bound to discharge the excess money, and that if the vendee was put to any expense in connection with the deposit of the mortgage-money by reason of any bad faith or dishonesty on the part of the mortgagee he was to bear the burden of that cost himself. The vendee made no attempt to redeem the mortgage. Long after the date of the sale and the date when redemption of the mortgage first became possible, the mortgagee sued both the vendor and the vendee on the basis of the mortgage and obtained a decree against them. The vendee discharged the whole decretal amount and then brought a suit against the vendor for recovery of the difference between the sum he had had to pay for the satisfaction of the decree and the sum which had been left with him at the time of the sale for payment to the mortgagee:

Held, (1) that the vendee was bound in the first instance to redeem, or at least to make an attempt to redeem the mortgage; [p. 365, col. 2.]

(2) that the vendee having failed to make an attempt to redeem the mortgage at a reasonably early date after the conclusion of the sale-transaction, so as to discover that the money left with him fell short of the requisite amount, he was not entitled to the sum claimed by him, but only to the difference between the sum left with him and the amount which was actually payable to the mortgagee on the date when redemption of the mortgage first became possible. [p. 366, col. 1.]

The Hon'ble Mirza Sami Ullah Beg, for the Respondent.

*The judgment in this case disposes of two cases together, viz., Second Civil Appeal No. 252 of 1914 and First Civil Appeal No. 38 of 1915—Ed.

MAZHAR ALI KHAN v. ALI ASGHAR.

JUDGMENT.—These two appeals, although they arise out of two different suits, may conveniently be disposed of by one and the same judgment. Both suits have their origin in a deed which was executed on the 9th of November 1895 by one Mazhar Ali Khan in favour of Ali Asghar. Mazhar Ali Khan was the plaintiff in the suit out of which the second appeal has sprung. He has died since the institution of the suit and is represented by three ladies Musammât Siraj-un-nisa, Musammât Ikbâl-un-nisa and Musammât Shakir-un-nisa. Ali Asghar, the other party to the sale-deed just mentioned, was the plaintiff in the suit which has given rise to First Civil Appeal No. 38 of 1915. In order to understand the matters in issue between the parties to these two cases it is necessary to go back to the year 1891. On the 31st of March of that year Mazhar Ali, who was at that time the owner of an entire village named Khairanpur Ganwansa, situated in the Unao district, mortgaged it with possession to a lady named Musammât Husaini Jan to secure a loan of Rs. 5,000. The period of the mortgage was five years and it was provided that the mortgagor was to be at liberty to redeem in the first "khali fasl Jeth," which fell after the expiry of the mortgage period. There is no dispute now that redemption of this mortgage first became possible on the 28th of April 1896. During the year 1891 Mazhar Ali executed three deeds of further charge in favour of his mortgagee; a fourth deed was executed on the 12th of January 1895. On the 9th of November 1895 Mazhar Ali sold a 12-annas share of this village to the other party to these cases, namely, Ali Asghar. The price at which this share was sold was stated in the deed to be Rs. 7,431. Out of this Rs. 100 was taken up in defraying the expenses of stamping and registering the deed. The balance Rs. 7,331 was left with Ali Asghar for payment to the mortgagee. The other terms of the sale-deed will be considered at a later stage. It is sufficient at the present time to say that no attempt seems to have been made by Ali Asghar to redeem Husaini Jan's mortgage. It may here be mentioned that under this mortgage of the 31st of March 1891 it had been agreed between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that if redemption did not take place in the first "khali fasl Jeth" after the expiry of the mortgage period, the mortgagee was to be entitled to remain in possession for a further period of fifteen years with an option of bringing a suit at any time for the sale of the property for the purpose of recovering her mortgage-money. In the month of July 1911 Husaini Jan brought a suit for sale against her mortgagor Mazhar Ali and his purchaser Ali Asghar. She claimed a sum of close on Rs. 14,000. On the 23rd of March 1911 the suit was compromised, the mortgagee agreeing to accept a sum of Rs. 10,525. A decree was passed in terms of this compromise and eventually in the month of December 1911 the total debt, which was due under the decree and which at that date amounted to Rs. 11,915, was discharged by the purchaser Ali Asghar. Ali Asghar has, therefore, brought the suit out of which First Civil Appeal No. 38 of 1915 has arisen, in order to recover from Mazhar Ali or his representatives in interest the difference between the sum which he had to pay for redemption of Husaini Jan's mortgage and the sum of Rs. 7,331 left with him at the time of the execution of the sale for payment to the mortgagee. His case may be put briefly as follows. He says that the sum which was left with him for redemption was insufficient to discharge the mortgage; that it was the duty of the mortgagor Mazhar Ali to give him a clear title and to pay all that was owing in respect of the mortgage and deeds of further charge executed in favour of Musammât Husaini Jan, that Mazhar Ali failed to discharge this legal duty and that the result of his failure was that he (Ali Asghar) was obliged to pay a sum much in excess of the money which was left with him for redemption. The defence put forward to this claim was that the duty of redeeming the property lay with the purchaser; that he failed to take any steps towards redemption until the mortgagee brought a suit and obtained a decree and that if he has been obliged to pay a sum largely in excess of the amount which was left with him in order to obtain redemption, he is liable to bear the loss by reason of his failure to perform the duty which was laid upon him in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale entered into on the 9th of November 1895. I may here briefly describe the nature of the claim which was brought by Mazhar Ali who was the original plaintiff in the suit out of which Second Civil Appeal No. 252 of 1914 has sprung. Under the terms of his mortgage executed in favour of Husaini Jan, Mazhar Ali was entitled to an allowance from the mortgagee at the rate of Rs. 15 a month. At the time when the suit brought by the mortgagee was compromised, an account was taken of the money which was outstanding on this account. It appears that the mortgagee had not paid this annuity for a number of years and when the compromise was arrived at and accounts were taken, a sum of Rs. 1,292 was set off as being the amount due for guzara to the mortgagor Mazhar Ali. Mazhar Ali, therefore, claimed that he was entitled to recover this sum from Ali Asghar who had failed to redeem the mortgage. His case was that this money which was owing to him had been applied in satisfaction of the mortgage decree. Mazhar Ali's suit was tried first. The Court of first instance, the Subordinate Judge of Unao, was of opinion that the responsibility for failure to redeem the mortgage lay with Mazhar Ali the mortgagor and not with his purchaser Ali Asghar and consequently he was of opinion that Mazhar Ali was not entitled to recover this amount. He held on the fourth issue raised in that suit that if it were possible to say that it was the duty of Ali Asghar to redeem the mortgage on the 28th of April 1896, Mazhar Ali would be justly entitled to the sum which he was claiming. This decree of the Subordinate Judge was appealed and his order was upheld in appeal by the learned Additional Judge of Lucknow. The other suit out of which First Civil Appeal No. 38 of 1915 has arisen was tried by another Subordinate Judge of Unao. He has adopted a different interpretation of the rights and liabilities of the parties arising out of the sale transaction of the 9th of November 1895. He holds that on a proper construction of the deed of sale and having regard to the attendant circumstances Ali Asghar was bound to redeem the mortgage. The Subordinate Judge has found that he failed to discharge this duty, and he has, therefore, disallowed the greater portion of the claim made by Ali Asghar. He has decided that the most that Ali Asghar could recover was a sum of Rs. 59-4-3.

To deal first with the first appeal in which Ali Asghar is the appellant. The case which has been put forward on his behalf is that the Subordinate Judge has taken a wrong view of the legal relations which were created by the deed of sale of the 9th of November 1895. It is argued that Mazhar Ali as the vendor of the property free from any encumbrance was bound to secure a good title to his purchaser and that for that purpose it lay upon Mazhar Ali to take steps to redeem the mortgage in favour of Musammât Husaini Jan. It is said that Mazhar Ali having failed to carry out his contract the plaintiff, having been damnified to a substantial extent by this failure, was entitled to recover the sum claimed by way of damages for breach of a contract. This brings us at once to the principal issue which has to be decided in these two cases. It is not to be denied that in the absence of a contract to the contrary the seller of immoveable property is bound, except in the case where the property is sold subject to encumbrances, to discharge encumbrances on the property existing at the time of the sale [section 55 (1) (g) of the Transfer of Property Act]. Looking at the terms of the sale-deed in suit which is marked Exhibit 22, it appears to me to be clear beyond all dispute that the conveyance was a conveyance of property not subject to encumbrances. An attempt indeed was made to argue in the opposite sense but such an argument could not, in my opinion, in the face of the language of the deed in question be seriously entertained. In dealing with this question of the duty to redeem two cases were cited before the lower Court. One of these is a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council, which is reported as Muhammad Siddiq Khan v. Muhammad Nasir Ullah Khan (1). The other case, a decision of the Allahabad High Court, is to be found as Badri Das v. Jiwan Lal (2). In the case decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council it was held that where money was left with a purchaser for the purpose of paying off the mortgage he was entitled to retain it as a security that the property sold should be freed from the encumbrances upon it and that he should have a good title. Their Lordships laid down that the purchaser was entitled to retain such money until the vendor provided the rest of the money necessary for the purpose of redemption. This ruling of their Lordships was followed in the Allahabad case which has been mentioned. There again it was held that it was the duty of the vendor to give a clear title to the purchaser, subject only to the payment by the purchaser of the sum left in his hands. The general law, therefore, relating to cases of this kind must be taken to be settled by the two judgments I have just referred to, and indeed they do nothing more than declare the law as laid down in the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act to which I have referred above. At the same time it is clear that these rights and obligations arising between the vendor and the purchaser of immovable property may be varied by covenants contained in the contract of sale, and what I have to consider here in particular is whether on the terms of the sale-deed of the 9th of November 1895 the duty of redeeming the pre-existing mortgage or at any rate of making an attempt to redeem it was not cast upon the purchaser Ali Asghar. The learned Subordinate Judge and the learned Additional Judge who dealt with the case in which Mazhar Ali was the plaintiff accepted the law as laid down in the two judgments I have referred to above and applied it to the present case without making any attempt to distinguish the facts. The learned Subordinate Judge who tried the suit brought by Ali Asghar has made an attempt to distinguish the facts of the two reported cases from the facts of the case with which we are now dealing. I am not disposed to agree with all the reasons which are given in the latter judgment for the distinctions drawn between this case and the two reported cases. But after a careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that the view taken by the Subordinate Judge in the suit brought by Ali Asghar is a correct view and is based upon what I consider to be fair and proper construction of the terms of the sale-deed.

I do not suggest that any different principle can be applied in the decision of the present suit by reason of the fact that in the two reported cases just mentioned the suits were brought by the vendor and not by the purchaser. But one important difference is to be noticed. Both in the case which came before their Lordships of the Privy Council and in the case which was decided in the Allahabad High Court, the purchaser had at a reasonably early date after the conclusion of the transaction of sale made an attempt to redeem the mortgages and had discovered that the money left for the purpose of redemption was in each case short of the requisite amount. In the present case, as I have already mentioned, Ali Asghar does not appear to have made any endeavour to redeem the mortgage; on the contrary he seems to have waited from the year 1895 until a suit was brought by the mortgagee in the year 1911 before he took any steps to clear the property of the encumbrance.

I turn now to a consideration of certain provisions of the sale-deed. The vendor Mazhar Ali stated in this deed that the principal amounts which were due by him to Husaini Jan in respect of the mortgage-deed and of the deeds of further charge amounted to Rs. 6,652-2-6. It is clearly stated in the deed that interest was due on these sums; presumably some account was made up between the parties to this deed of sale, for it is only in this way that we can account for the fact that a specific sum of Rs. 7,331 was left with the purchaser for the purpose of obtaining redemption. No doubt the language of the document shows that it was contemplated by the parties that this amount might fall short of the sum actually due, and so we find a provision by which the vendor undertook the liability of discharging any sum in excess of this amount of Rs. 7,331 which was left with the purchaser for the purpose of discharging the mortgage. I quote in original the words relating to this part of the contract.—“Agar zar saman mundarya bainama jo kabza mushtari men waste adai zar rahen murtahna ke chhora gaya hui kafi na ho aur bagaraz mazkur kuch aur rupiya zaid murtahna ko dena ya jama karna pare to uski zimmedari aur adai simma mujh baya ke hai.” To this I may add the clause which follows and which seems to me to be of some importance in deciding upon the proper construction of this contract. It is as follows: "Kharcha ijtimā zar rahen ka bar jo fak-i-rahēn men ba wajah murtahān ki bad muamlagi ke pare, kull zimme mushtari ke hai. Mujh baya se kuch wasta nahin."

Now reading these clauses together it is apparent that the vendor was to be responsible to make good to the purchaser any sum in excess of the Rs. 7,331 which he had to pay for the purpose of obtaining redemption. The liability, however, for this excess could only arise when it had been actually ascertained that the sum of Rs. 7,331 was in fact too little for the purpose of discharging the encumbrances. How then was it contemplated that the amount of this liability should be ascertained? It seems to me that what was intended clearly was that at any rate the purchaser was in the first instance to make an attempt to redeem the mortgages. By doing so and by putting himself in contact with the mortgagee he could at once discover whether or not the sum of Rs. 7,331 was sufficient for the purpose. Until something of this kind was done it was quite impossible to cast any definite liability under the terms of this contract upon the vendor Mazhar Ali. That the intention was that the purchaser should make this attempt to redeem seems to me to be more clearly brought out by the last clause which I have quoted above, which provides that if the purchaser were put to any expense in connection with the deposit of the mortgage-money by reason of any bad faith or dishonesty on the part of the mortgagee he was to bear the burden of that cost himself. The vendor was not to be responsible for any costs so incurred. On the terms, therefore, of this document I am prepared to hold that the purchaser took upon himself the duty of redeeming or at any rate of attempting to redeem the encumbrances and as he failed to do anything of the sort, I agree with the learned Judge of the lower Court that his suit cannot be decreed to the extent he claims. Instead of making any attempt to clear off the mortgage-debts he sat quiet for a period of about sixteen years and allowed the mortgage-debt to accumulate to a very large sum and now he is asking the representatives of his vendor to re-emburse him for a loss which was entirely due to his own failure to discharge his part of the contract. Without agreeing in all the reasons given by the learned Subordinate Judge for his decision I am satisfied that he was right in this respect, namely, that the purchaser Ali Asghar failed to carry out his part of the contract and that he is not entitled, therefore, to the sum he claims. I may here mention that Ali Asghar did not go into the witness-box to give any evidence relating either to this transaction of sale or to any of the events which followed afterwards. The representatives of the mortgage presumably were unable to give any information regarding these matters and their evidence, of course, was not taken. There is, however, a document upon the record which demands some passing consideration. It seems that in or about the year 1901 Mazhar Ali got impatient regarding the failure of his purchaser to attempt anything in the way of redeeming the mortgage. It will be remembered that the purchaser had taken a conveyance of only a 12-annas share in the property and that one result of redemption would have been that a 4-annas share of the property would have returned to the possession of Mazhar Ali. He sent a notice to Ali Asghar calling attention to the fact that there had been a great delay in redeeming the mortgage and pointing out the heavy losses which were being incurred in this connection.

Ali Asghar in reply to this notice sent a letter to Mazhar Ali (Exhibit 3) upon the file. In this letter Ali Asghar professes that at the time when the deed of sale was executed it was understood between the parties that the sum of Rs. 7,331 was considerably short of the amount which was required for the discharge of the mortgages. He states in the letter that Mazhar Ali had undertaken to raise the balance due on the mortgages by borrowing the necessary amount from a person named Farid-uz-zaman. In fact in this letter he goes as far as to say that he was aware that Mazhar Ali executed a mortgage in favour of this person Farid-uz-zaman in order to raise a sum of Rs. 568, the amount by which Rs. 7,531 fell short of the money payable to Musammāt Husaini Jan. I have mentioned that Ali Asghar did not go into the witness-box to explain the statements contained in the letter, and I may say at once that this belated account of what took place in the year 1895 appears to me to be quite untrue. From the calculations which have been made by the Courts below, it is quite clear that although the sum of Rs. 7,331 did actually fall short of the sum which was payable to Husaini Jan on the 28th April 1896, it fell short only by a very small amount and certainly not by any such sum as the Rs. 568 which is referred to in Exhibit 3. Of course this document Exhibit 3 cannot be treated as evidence in the case in favour of Ali Asghar who wrote it. But it is at any rate important to notice that Ali Asghar, having in the year 1901 set up a plea that there was some subsidiary contract between himself and Mazhar Ali relating to the discharge of the mortgage-deed, had not the courage to enter the witness-box and to depose to what is stated in the document referred to. I refuse to believe that there was any such understanding between Mazhar Ali and Ali Asghar at the time of the execution of the deed of sale and having regard to the surrounding circumstances and principally to the facts, first, that the purchase-money was calculated on a very liberal scale and second, that Mazhar Ali was presumably anxious to recover possession of a 4-annas share of his property, I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge is right when he says that the real understanding between the parties was that Ali Asghar was to take immediate steps to redeem the mortgages. This being so, I agree with the finding of the Court below that Ali Asghar is in no way entitled to the enormous sum which he has claimed in this suit.

The question then remains as to what sum he is entitled to recover. He certainly is entitled to the difference between Rs. 7,331 and the amount which was actually payable on the 28th of April 1896 when the redemption of the mortgage became possible. I may mention here that Ali Asghar in the letter Exhibit 3 above referred to seems to have made a grievance regarding the delay in the registration of the sale-deed executed in November 1895. This deed it seems was not registered until the month of March 1896. What the reason of the delay was is difficult to ascertain, but at any rate it cannot be said that in any way it prevented Ali Asghar from offering the money to the mortgagee on the 28th of April 1896 either by tendering it to her or by making a deposit in Court. I have already mentioned that the learned Subordinate Judge found that the difference between the sum actually due on the mortgage and deeds of previous charge on the date just mentioned came to Rs. 48-9-1 more than Rs. 7,331 left with Ali Asghar. I see no reason for supposing that this account is incorrect. It agrees substantially with a similar account which was made by the other Subordinate Judge in the suit which was brought by Mazhar Ali against Ali Asghar. I have now to notice another point in the case relating to an item of Rs. 309. In order to understand the dispute regarding this sum it is necessary to refer to the language of the deed of mortgage executed in 1891. It seems that when this mortgage was executed, the term of the old settlement was shortly about to expire and the parties had in contemplation the possibility of an enhancement of the Government revenue at the time of the new assessment. It was agreed between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that any enhancement in the Government demand was to be payable by the mortgagor. It was also provided that if at the time of the new settlement the mortgagee who was in possession was put to any expenses in the matter of contesting liability to the new assessment, those costs were to be borne by the mortgagor also. So far as the question of liability for the enhancement of the Government demand is concerned, that is quite clear from the terms of the mortgage; the revenue was enhanced, the mortgagee had to pay a larger sum every year on account of revenue and cesses. This excess has been taken into account by the learned Subordinate Judge in determining the amount which was due to the mortgagee on the 28th of April 1896, and I have nothing more to say with regard to this point. There remains the question of the mortgagee's right to claim from the mortgagor any expenses incurred by her in contesting the new assessment. It is said that this sum came to Rs. 309 and that, therefore, in making out the account of what was due to Husaini Jan on the 28th of April 1896 this sum of Rs. 309 ought to be added to the money due on account of principal, interest and excess revenue charges. The learned Subordinate Judge who has tried the suit out of which this first appeal has arisen refused to allow this item of Rs. 309 to be taken into account, on the ground that there was no proof on the record that such expense had actually been incurred by Musammât Husaini Jan. The other Court which tried the suit in which Mazhar Ali was the plaintiff seems to have given the mortgagee credit for this amount, and the question is which of the two Courts was right. The only evidence to which I have been referred in this connection is as follows. I have already mentioned that in the year 1901 Mazhar Ali wrote to his purchaser Ali Asghar demanding that he should make an attempt to redeem the mortgages held by Husaini Jan, and in that letter it seems that he mentioned that Musammât Husaini Jan was entitled to a sum of Rs. 419-15-0 on account of expenses of litigation incurred by her at the time of the new settlement. The other piece of evidence is to be found in the plaint which was filed by Musammât Husaini Jan when she brought her suit for her mortgage-money in the year 1911. In that plaint she mentioned this figure of Rs. 309 as being the sum which she was entitled to recover from the mortgagor on account of the settlement expenses. Mazhar Ali was the defendant in that case and he denied in his written statement that this sum was owing to Musammât Husaini Jan. These are the two pieces of evidence which we have to consider in discussing the question as to whether this sum of Rs. 309 is to be taken into account. There is, of course, the admission made by Mazhar Ali in the letter which he wrote to the plaintiff Ali Asghar. That admission may be taken for what it is worth, but it is not in any way conclusive; nor can it be said that Mazhar Ali or his representatives-in-interest are bound by it so as to raise an estoppel. The question is, what value attaches to this admission made in the year 1901. The learned Counsel who appears for respondents has suggested that the admission as evidence is really of no value at all, inasmuch as there is nothing to show that Mazhar Ali had or could have any personal knowledge of the extent to which his mortgagee Musammât Husaini Jan was out of pocket at the time of the new settlement. He also argues that in all probability this item was mentioned in Mazhar Ali's letter by way of bluff and in order to impress Ali Asghar with a sense of the loss which was being incurred by reason of the delay in redeeming the mortgage. On the other hand it is pointed out that when Musammât Husaini Jan filed a plaint in the year 1911 and claimed Rs. 309 for settlement expenses, this portion of her claim was denied by Mazhar Ali. The matter was never put to proof inasmuch as the suit was compromised, and consequently there is no evidence on the record to establish that this was the sum which Husaini Jan was actually bound to part. After a careful consideration of the arguments in this connection I have come to the opinion that the Subordinate Judge came to a right conclusion and that he properly refused to allow this sum of Rs. 309 to be added to the amount which he found to be due to the mortgagee on the 28th of April 1896. The result of all this is, therefore, that, in my opinion, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is substantially correct and is not liable to be interfered with and consequently I dismiss this First Civil Appeal No. 38 of 1915 with costs to the respondents.

This leaves me with the other case to dispose of, namely, Second Civil Appeal No. 252 of 1914. I have already dealt with the nature of this claim and referred to the fact that it was dismissed by both the lower Courts on the ground that the duty of redeeming the mortgages lay upon Mazhar Ali the vendor and not upon the purchaser Ali Asghar. The Subordinate Judge, as I have said, held that if the duty of redemption lay upon Ali Asghar then Mazhar Ali was clearly entitled to the sum which he was claiming in this suit. As I have now found for the reasons above stated that Ali Asghar was in default and not Mazhar Ali, the result is that I hold that Mazhar Ali was entitled to have a decree in his favour. Accordingly I allow Second Civil Appeal No. 252 of 1914

OPPOSITE PARTY.

Putni Regulation (VIII of 1819), s. 15, cl. 2, whether affected by Act VIII B. C. of 1865, s. 3.

Clause 2 of section 15 of the Putni Regulation has not been affected by section 3 of Act VIII B. C. of 1865, so that a purchaser of a putni tenure seeking to proceed under that clause must apply to the District Judge, and not to the Collector. [p. 369, col. 1.]

Rule against an order of the District Judge, 24 Perganas, dated the 21st August 1916.

Babu Narendra Chandra Bose, for the Petitioner.

Babu Ram Charan Mitra, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule raises an important question of first impression as to the true effect of section 2 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C. upon the second clause of section 15 of Regulation VIII of 1819. The clause in question describes the procedure to be followed in case of opposition to the new purchaser of the putni, when he proceeds to take possession of the land covered by his purchase. The clause lays down that if the late incumbent himself or the holders of tenures or assignments derived from the late incumbent and intermediate between him and the actual cultivators shall attempt to offer opposition or to interfere with the collections of the new purchaser from the land composing his purchase, the latter shall be at liberty to apply immediately to the Civil Court for the aid of the public officers in obtaining possession of his rights. Section 3 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C. provides that the sale for the recovery of arrears of rent of putni taluks and other saleable under-tenures of the nature defined in clause (2) of section 8 of Regulation VIII of 1819 shall be conducted by the Collector of land revenue in whose jurisdiction, as defined by Act VI of 1853, the lands lie, and all acts preparatory to or connected with the sale of such under-tenures as aforesaid, which by Regulation VIII of 1819 and Regulation I of 1820 the Judge is required to perform, shall be performed by the said Collector. The question thus arises, whether the effect of section 3 is to make it obligatory upon the purchaser, when he seeks to proceed under the second clause of section 15 of the Regulation, to apply not to the District Judge but to the Collector.

The answer to the question in controversy depends upon the true meaning of the expression "acts preparatory to or connected with the sale," in section 3 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C. Instances of acts preparatory to or connected with the sale were contained in sections 8 and 9 of the Regulation as originally framed. Section 8 required the zemindar, when he desired to sell a putni for arrears of rent, to present a petition to the Civil Court of the District and a similar one to the Collector. Section 9 contained a provision that the sale should be made by the Registrar of the Civil Court, or in his absence, by the person in charge of the office of Judge or of Magistrate of the District. These were clearly acts preparatory to or connected with the sale, and the effect of section 3 was to render these provisions nugatory and to transfer the functions to the Collector. Now, can it be reasonably maintained, in the case before us, that what the petitioner asks the District Judge to do is an act connected with the sale? We are of opinion that the question should be answered in the negative. The sale took place on the 16th May 1910. Proceedings were taken to annul the sale and have terminated in favour of the purchaser. The sale has consequently become for all purposes final and conclusive. The purchaser now alleges that he is resisted in his attempt to take possession of the lands comprised in the tenure purchased by him. Can it be said, when he seeks the assistance of the District Judge under the second clause of section

SADHO CHARAN PRASAD v. RAM RATAN.

15 of the Regulation, that the act to be performed is connected with the sale? Clearly not. It is an act subsequent to the sale, an act which can be performed only on the basis of a valid and concluded sale, no longer liable to be impeached. We must hold accordingly that clause 2 of section 15 of the Regulation has not been affected by section 3 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C. The view we take is confirmed by two circumstances. In the first place, Act VIII of 1865 B. C., as is explained in the preamble, was enacted because "doubts have arisen in consequence of the repeal of section 16 of Regulation VII of 1832 as to the authority by whom putni taluks and other saleable under-tenures of the nature defined in clause 1 of section 8 of Regulation VIII of 1819 are to be sold for arrears of rent due to the proprietor on account thereof." There is no indication here that the Legislature intended that any alteration should be effected in the second clause of section 15. In the second place, that the Legislature had no such intention is conclusively proved by the provisions of Act XVI of 1874. That Act was passed for the purpose of repealing certain obsolete enactments, because, as explained in the preamble, "the enactments mentioned in the Schedule to the Act had ceased to be in force otherwise than by express and specific repeal." In the Schedule we find that certain expressions in sections 8 and 9 of the Putni Regulation which had become obsolete by reason of the provisions of section 3 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C. are expressly repealed. But clause 2 of section 15 is left untouched. If the Legislature had thought in 1874 that the provisions of clause 2 of section 15 had been affected by section 3 of Act VIII of 1865 B. C., no doubt that section also would have been suitably altered.

On these grounds we hold that the view taken by the District Judge is erroneous and that he has failed to exercise the jurisdiction still vested in him by law, that is, under clause 2 of section 15 of the Putni Regulation. The Rule is made absolute and the order of the District Judge is set aside; the petition will be transmitted to the District Judge in order that he may take necessary steps thereon in accordance with law.

Rule made absolute.

Where a Hindu father makes a mortgage for legal necessity at an onerous rate of interest, the sons, although bound by the mortgage, are not bound by the rate of interest, unless the mortgagee establishes that such rate of interest was justified by the legal necessity of the family. If the mortgagee fails to prove this fact, the Courts not only have a discretion but are under an obligation to vary the rate of interest to a reasonable limit. [p. 370, col. 2.]

Where a decree is obtained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor alone on the basis of a mortgage executed by a Hindu father and carrying interest at an onerous rate, his sons, who were no parties to the said decree, can, in a subsequent suit against the mortgagee decree-holder, be granted relief to the effect that if they pay to the mortgagee the principal mortgage-money together with interest thereon at a reasonable rate and costs of his suit by a certain date, the mortgage decree shall not be executed against the mortgaged property. JUDGMENT.—Chaudhri Audesh Rai executed on 19th June 1908 a deed of simple mortgage for Rs. 2,500 in favour of Ram Ratan Lal and Mahabir Prasad by which he hypothecated a two-annas share in Maddo, a two annas share in Deoria, and a four annas share in Manjhari. The deed carried 24 per cent. compound interest with quarterly rests. The amount of consideration was made up of two items, one for Rs. 2,448-6-0 due to the mortgagees on account of a balance of the amount due to them from the mortgagor on the basis of a promissory note and the other for Rs. 51-10-0 paid in cash. The mortgagees instituted a suit on the basis of the deed against the mortgagor alone and obtained a decree on 26th February 1914 for Rs. 2,500 principal, Rs. 5,826-6-3 interest, costs and future interest. To these proceedings the present plaintiff-appellant was no party. In execution of the decree they have brought the mortgaged property to sale but it has not yet been sold. Sadho Charan Prasad son of the mortgagor instituted on 19th January 1916 a suit for a declaration that the decree in question was of no effect against him as a son of Chaudhri Audesh Rai and a member of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law as he had been no party to the execution of the mortgage of 19th June 1908 and was a minor on the date when it was executed. He asked that the decree should be set aside or in the alternative that if the decree be not set aside he should be given an opportunity of saving the property attached from sale on the payment of a sum to be fixed by the Court. This suit was instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gonda who dismissed it by a judgment dated the 6th June 1916. The present appeal is preferred against the dismissal.

The learned Counsel for the appellant has withdrawn a great portion of the pleas stated in the grounds of appeal. He has admitted in argument that an amount of Rs. 2,448-6-0 was owing to the mortgagees on the balance due on the promissory note executed by his father and that his father had borrowed Rs. 3,100 on the said promissory note. He further withdrew the plea that the loan of Rs. 3,100 was tainted with immorality. He did not contest the position that the amount of Rs. 2,448-6-0 was an antecedent debt due from his father and binding on himself, and he further admitted that the amount of Rs. 51-10-0 had been devoted to the costs of execution of the deed of mortgage of 19th June 1908 and that that amount was also binding on him. He thus took the position that his client was legally bound in respect of the principal of Rs. 2,500 and confined his arguments to the one ground, that although a legal necessity had been made out for the execution of the deed on the principal amount, he was not bound to pay compound interest at 24 per cent. with quarterly rests but only such interest as the Court might consider to be reasonable. To this argument we must accede. The learned Subordinate Judge apparently overlooked the point though it was clearly before him upon the issues. Their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down in the case of Hurro Nath Rai Chowdhri v. Randhir Singh (1) that when a Hindu widow was borrowing in a case of necessity it was for the plaintiff in that case to see whether there was really and fairly a ground of necessity, and that it was further for the plaintiff to see whether there was a necessity to borrow at a certain rate. They say: "If it were unreasonable to suppose that the widow could not borrow the money at a less amount than 18 per cent., he ought not to have charged her that rate." This finding applied to the case of a Hindu widow; but the principle has equal application to the case of a head of a joint family. In June last year Sundar Lal, J., decided that Hindu sons who were bound by a transfer executed by their father were not bound by the onerous rate of interest to which their father agreed. This decision will be found in Padam Singh v. Ram Rup (2), and one of the members of this Bench decided in the following July in Sarabjit Singh v. Gur Bakhsh Singh (3) that the burden of proof was on the persons in whose favour deeds of mortgage had been executed to establish that satisfaction of both the principal and the interest was justified by the legal necessity of the family and that Court not only had discretion but were under an obligation to vary the rate of interest if it were not established that the necessity of the family justified as high a rate. The learned Counsel for the respondents has not seriously endeavoured to meet the argument. We, therefore, accede to the appellant's plea upon this point and it remains only to be seen what rate of interest should be awarded. We are of opinion that, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, the value of the security, and the relationship of the creditors and debtor, the right rate of interest should be simple interest at 12 per cent. We have then to see what relief should be awarded to the plaintiff-appellant. There is a decree outstanding against the family property. Although it would have been open to us, had he shown that such a decree could not be binding against his interest in the family property, to give him a declaration to that effect, we are precluded from modifying the decretal amount upon our finding. We cannot say that the decree shall be binding against the family property only to the extent of the amount that the appellant is liable to pay and that any balance of sale-proceeds over and above that amount shall go to the mortgagor. But we can give the plaintiff-appellant the alternative relief which he sought in his plaint. We can declare that if he pay a certain amount by a certain date the decree to which he was not a party shall not be executed against the family property. We propose to give relief in this manner. We direct that if the appellant pay Rs. 2,500 principal, Rs. 2,575 simple interest at 12 per cent. from 19th June 1908 to date, and Rs. 718-10-0 costs of the suit—total Rs. 5,793-10-0 with future interest at 12 per cent. on Rs. 2,500 from to-day till date of payment, to the holders of the decree, the decree of 26th February 1914 shall not be executed by sale against the family property. As the appellant has partly failed and partly succeeded in these proceedings we direct that the parties pay their own costs throughout the whole proceedings.

Appeal partly allowed.

Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 76—Mortgagee taking possession on failure of mortgagor to pay mortgage money—Liability of mortgagor.

When during the continuance of a mortgage by conditional sale, the mortgagee takes possession of the mortgaged property with the consent of the mortgagor, on the failure of the latter to pay the mortgage-money on the due date, the nature of the contract between the parties is not altered and the conditional mortgage is not transformed into a usufructuary mortgage; but what happens in essence is that the parties adopt a certain mode of satisfaction of the mortgage. Consequently no question arises in such a case as to the effect of section 92 of the Evidence Act. [p. 372, col. 1.]

The possession of the mortgagee thus taken cannot extinguish the title of the mortgagor till a decree absolute is made in a foreclosure suit properly framed for the purpose, and the mortgagee who remains in possession in this way is bound to appropriate his receipts from the mortgaged property towards the reduction of the mortgage-debt in view of the provisions of section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act. [p. 372, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Murshidabad, dated the 14th May 1913, reversing that of the Munsif, Berhampur, dated the 9th August 1912.

Babu Hemendra Nath Sen, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by two of the defendants in a foreclosure suit. On the 2nd December 1908, the first defendant executed in favour of the plaintiff an instrument which was a mortgage by conditional sale within the meaning of clause (c) of section 58 of the Transfer of Property Act. The mortgagor ostensibly sold the mortgaged property on condition that on default of payment of the mortgage-money on the 14th May 1909, the sale would become absolute. The principal amount was Rs. 41 and carried interest at the rate of $37\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum. The document further recited that the mortgagor retained possession of the property. The case for the plaintiff is that the mortgage-money was not re-paid on the due date, with the result that from the 15th May 1909, she entered into possession of the mortgaged property with the consent of the mortgagor. She continued in peaceful occupation till she was dispossessed by force on the 1st April 1912, by the third defendant who had meanwhile succeeded to the interest of the mortgagor. On the 12th April 1912, she instituted the present suit for foreclosure. She claimed to recover Rs. 41 as principal and Rs. 51-4-0 as interest therein from the date of the mortgage to the date of the institution of the suit, and prayed that the usual foreclosure decree might be made as provided in Order XXIV of the Civil Procedure Code. The defendants pleaded that the claim was entirely unfounded as the mortgage-debt had been fully satisfied by means of the profits received by the mortgagee during the period of her occupation of the mortgaged premises. The Court of first instance made a preliminary decree in the terms prescribed by the Code and directed the usual accounts to be taken. When accounts were taken, it transpired that the mortgage-debt, principal and interest, had been satisfied in full by the profits received by the plaintiff during her possession of the mortgaged properties. The result was that the Trial Court ultimately dismissed the suit. Upon appeal that decree has been reversed by the District Judge, on the ground that section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act precluded proof that the terms of the original mortgage were modified so as to change it into a usufructuary mortgage. The defendants have appealed to this Court and have argued that this conclusion is based upon a complete misapprehension of the relative rights of the mortgagor and mortgagee. In our opinion this contention is well-founded.

AFSAR SHAIK V. SAURAVA SUNDARI DAS.

The plaintiff alleges in her plaint that she took possession of the mortgaged property, with the consent of the mortgagor, when the latter failed to pay the mortgage money on the due date. It is a mistake to suppose that this altered the nature of the contract between the parties and transformed the conditional mortgage into a usufructuary mortgage; what happened in essence was that the parties adopted a mode of satisfaction of the mortgage [Kamla Sahai v. Babu Nandan Mian (1); Lala Himmat Sahai Singh v. Illewhehlen (2)]; consequently no question arises as to the effect of section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act. The real point in controversy is, whether the sums received by the mortgagee during her possession of the mortgaged premises must be applied by her in reduction of the mortgage-debt. The answer must be in the affirmation in view of the provisions of section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act. Clause (h) of that section provides that where, during the continuance of the mortgage, the mortgagee takes possession of the mortgaged property, his receipts from the mortgaged property shall, after deducting the expenses mentioned in clauses (c) and (d) [that is, revenue, public charges, rent, and cost of repairs], and interest thereon, be debited against him in reduction of the amount, if any, from time to time due to him on account of interest on the mortgage-money, and so far as such receipts exceed any interest due, in reduction or discharge of the mortgage-money. It is perfectly plain that the plaintiff took possession during the continuance of the mortgage, for the default of the mortgagor to pay the mortgage-money on the due date, did not extinguish the equity of redemption and transform the title of the mortgagee into full ownership. The plaintiff cannot but be deemed to have taken possession as mortgagee without any reasonable ground for belief that he was entitled to hold in a different capacity [Parkinson v. Hanbury (3); Gaskell v. Gosling (4)]. The case does not fall within the class of decisions, where the mortgagee has been led into an honest belief that upon non-payment by the mortgagor of the money at the time fixed, he became the absolute owner of the property: [Smyth v. Simpson (5); Anandray v. Ravji (6); Ramshet Bachashet v. Pandharinath (7)]. There was a valid mortgage in existence and in full operation when the mortgagee took possession; this, indeed, has been the common case of both the parties. The title of the mortgagors could not be extinguished till a decree absolute had been made in a foreclosure suit properly framed for the purpose. On the other hand, as the mortgagee, in the present litigation, claims interest for the full period between the execution of the mortgage and the institution of the suit, such claim can be sustained only on the theory that she has throughout this period retained the character of mortgagee. She is consequently bound to appropriate the profits, as mortgagee in possession in reduction of the mortgage-debt, on the principle recognised by the Judicial Committee in Sri Raja Papamma Rao v. Sri Vira Pratapa (8) and by this Court in Ramawatar v. Tulsi Prosad Singh (9); [Robertson v. Norris (10).] The true position is that the rents and profits are, in the view of a Court of Equity, incidents de jure to the ownership of the equity of redemption, and the mortgagee in possession is bound to apply whatever profits he actually receives towards the satisfaction of the mortgage debt.

If the contrary view were adopted, the result would be that the mortgagee would be allowed interest in addition to the profits retained by her, a position which cannot be justified on any conceivable ground of justice, equity and good conscience. We are clearly of opinion that the decree made by the Trial Court could not be successfully impeached; nothing was due to the plaintiff at the date of the institution of the suit, for the report of the Commissioner who took the accounts has ever been challenged.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the decree of the Court of first instance restored. The suit will thus stand dismissed with costs in all the Courts

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 18 (3).—

Court, power of—Sale, benami, by insolvent—Receiver, possession of—Jurisdiction.

Under section 18 (3) of the Provincial Insolvency Act the Court is competent to order that the property of the insolvent should be placed in the possession of the Receiver and to enquire whether the property is in reality in the possession of the insolvent and whether the Receiver is entitled to obtain possession of it. Where a sale of the insolvent's property is a mere benami transaction, it is not necessary for the insolvent or the Receiver who steps into his shoes to have the sale set aside and cancelled in order to maintain his possession over the property. [p. 374, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the District Judge, Gorakhpur, dated the 3rd July 1916.

Dr. S. N. Sen and Mr. Haribans Sahai,
for the Appellants.

Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an insolvency matter. In November 1913 Ramanand and Naurangi Lal, two brothers, applied to be adjudicated insolvents. The order of adjudication was not made until the 25th of August 1914 when a Receiver was appointed. The Receiver applied to the Court for possession of the property of the insolvents. Apparently he had been resisted by the present appellants who claimed to be the purchasers of the insolvent's property under the three sale deeds, dated respectively, the 1st of July 1911, the 13th of July 1911 and the 31st of August 1911. The learned Judge went into the matter, examined the evidence adduced on both sides, and came to the conclusion that the sale-deeds were mere fictitious and nominal documents executed by the insolvents in favour of their relatives, not as real transactions but merely as a blind to prevent the property being availed of by their creditors, that the insolvents themselves were in possession and that the so-called purchasers had never got possession. The learned Judge accordingly ordered that the Receiver should take possession of the property and deal with it as required by law. This appeal has been presented by three of the alleged purchasers. The first contention is that the Court below had no jurisdiction to deal with this matter in insolvency proceedings. Section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act has clearly no application to the present case inasmuch as the alleged transfers purported to have been made beyond two years prior to the date of adjudication in insolvency. Section 18 of the Act, however, provides in clause (c) that where the Court appoints a Receiver it may remove the person in whose possession or custody the property of the insolvent is, from the possession or custody thereof. If the property in question is in the possession of the insolvent, the Court undoubtedly has the power under this clause to remove the insolvent from the custody of the property and to put it in the custody of the Receiver. There is, however, a proviso to the clause to the effect that the provisions of the clause will not authorise the Court to remove from the possession or custody of the property any person whom the insolvent had not the present right to remove. If, as has been found in this case, the alleged sales were in reality no sales and the sale-deeds were mere waste paper, the insolvents could remove the purchasers, if they sought to take possession from the possession of the property. Therefore, acting under section 18, clause (3), the Court was fully competent to order that the property should be placed in the possession of the Receiver and to enquire whether the property was in reality in the possession of the insolvent and whether the Receiver was entitled to obtain possession of it. It is said that the insolvents were bound to bring a suit to set aside the sale within three years from the date thereof. We do not think that this is so. If there was no sale and if the transaction was a mere benami transaction, it was not necessary for the insolvents, and the Receiver, who had stepped into their shoes, to have the sales set aside and cancelled in order to maintain their possession over the property. The ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Petherpermal Chetty v. Muniandy Servai (1) appears to be in point. The learned Judge of the Court below was, therefore, justified in holding that Article 91, Schedule I of the Limitation Act, had no application to the present case. In our judgment the plea that the Court below had no jurisdiction to enquire into this matter is without force. On the merits of the case we see no reason to come to a different conclusion from that at which the Court

As regards the deed of relinquishment of sir lands no argument was addressed to us in this appeal. Furthermore the case of the deed of relinquishment would come within the operation of section 36 of the Act. We dismiss the appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

In determining what is a reasonable amount in a particular case, the Court must take into consideration the social practices of the class to which the deceased belonged. [p. 377, col. 2.]

Under the Muhammadan Law no formality is required to be gone through for the purpose of creating a valid wakf, it is enough if the donor declares that he constitutes a property wakf or has constituted it wakf. There must, however, be not only a mere intention to dedicate property but an actual dedication. [p. 378, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—This appeal and the cross-appeal No. 1510 of 1914 arise out of an action brought by the plaintiff Majid Ullah Khan against his elder brother Hamid Ullah Khan for the partition of moveable and immoveable property and cash left by their father Maulvi Sami Ullah Khan who died on the 7th April 1908. It is beyond dispute that the two sons are the heirs ab intestato to their father's estate, and that each of them is entitled to a moiety thereof. The suit was resisted by the defendant mainly on the ground that certain properties, claimed by the plaintiff did not form part of the estate, and were not consequently liable to partition. The District Judge has accepted this defence with respect to some properties, and, rejecting it in regard to others, has granted the plaintiff a preliminary decree directing the partition of the moveable and immoveable properties, which, in his opinion, constituted the estate of the deceased. Against this decree both the parties have preferred appeals to this Court, and these appeals may conveniently be disposed of by one judgment.

Before discussing the respective contentions of the parties in regard to each item of the properties in controversy we may state at once that several points, namely, misjoinder of causes of action, want of jurisdiction, etc., etc., which were mentioned in the defendant's memorandum of appeal, have not been argued before us; and we may, therefore, take it that the defendant does not dispute the finding of the lower Court on these points.

The question of limitation was raised with respect to moveable properties and cash, and it was originally contended that the suit, which was instituted on the 11th January 1912, more than three years after the death of the ancestor, was barred either under Article 49 or Article 62 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act. Mr. Muhammad Shafi for the defendant subsequently admitted the plaintiff's right to a share in all the moveable properties specified in the decree and confined the plea of limitation to the claim to one-half share of the money received by the defendant from the Delhi and London Bank, Limited, after his father's death. The learned Counsel mentioned Article 62 as the one prescribing the period applicable to that portion of the claim, but did not cite any authority in support of his contention. Now, it appears that with the exception of some cash, which was privately divided between the parties, the entire estate of the father is the subject-matter of the suit, and we do not think that Article 62 is applicable to a claim for a share of the cash which forms part of the estate to be divided between the co heirs. In Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (1) a Muhammadan widow sued her deceased husband's brother for a declaration of her right to possess for life the estate of her husband in accordance with the local custom, and in the alternative for a share of the estate according to Muhammadan Law, and also for possession of her share, and the question arose whether the claim qua the moveables and cash left by the deceased was governed by Article 49 or Article 123. The Courts in India had differed on that point, and their Lordships of the Privy Council in applying Article 120 to this portion of the claim made the following observations:

"The next objection was that the claim to cash and moveables was rightly held by the First Court to be barred by limitation. Their Lordships do not agree with either the Judicial Commissioner or the District Judge as to the Article in the Schedule to the Limitation Act which is applicable. This is not a suit for a distributive share of property (Article 123), nor a suit for specific moveable property wrongfully taken (Article 49). This latter Article does not appear to be applicable to a suit to establish a right to inherit the property of a deceased person. Article 120 provides a period of limitation of six years for a suit for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere in the Schedule. Their Lordships think this Article should be applied, unless it is clear that the suit is within some other Article, which in their opinion it is not, and consequently the suit as regards the moveable property is not barred."

It will be observed that money formed part of the estate in that case, and though Article 62 is not specifically referred to by their Lordships of the Privy Council, it is a legitimate inference from their judgment that if the aforesaid provision had been applicable, there would have been no room for the applicability of the residuary provision contained in Article 120. In the view, which we take, we are fortified by the decisions in Umardaraz Ali Khan v. Wilayat Ali Khan (2), Khadersa Hajee Bappu v. Puthen Veetil Ayissa Ummah (3) and Joti Parshad v. Sant Lal (4). We accordingly concur with the District Judge in holding that the suit is not barred by limitation.

Of the different items of properties referred to in the memorandum of appeal preferred by the defendant, the learned Counsel has withdrawn all objections to the findings of the District Judge relating to the house at Aligarh, the furniture, horse and phaeton there, and four pieces of jewellery namely, gold watch, gold chain, gold buttons and silver watch; and we need not, therefore, deal with them. The dispute in the defendant's appeal is, therefore, narrowed down to the following four properties:

(2) 19 A. 169; A. W. N. (1897) 34: 9 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 111.

(3) 6 Ind. Cas. 50; 34 M. 511; 20 M. L. J. 288; 8 M. L. T. 4; (1910) M. W. N. 447.

(4) 21 Ind. Cas. 919, 34 P. R. 1914; 13 P. L. R. 1914; 24 P. W. R. 1914

(a) Rs. 5,447 realised by the defendant from the Delhi and London Bank, Limited,

(b) Rs. 2,000 out of Rs. 3,000 left by the deceased with his servant Abdul Aziz,

(c) Six shops in Gali Batasha at Delhi,

(d) The residentiary house at Delhi now called "Hamid Manzil."

As regards the appeal preferred by the plaintiff, the dispute has been confined by Mr. Moti Sagar to three items of properties, namely,

(e) Certain shops in the Chandni Chauk at Delhi,

(f) A vacant plot of land in Darya Ganj at Delhi,

(g) The Government promissory notes of Rs. 30,000.

Taking these items seriatim, we think that the defendant has not substantiated his exclusive right to Rs. 5,447. It is admitted that he realised the money on 13th July 1908, about three months after the death of his father, from the Delhi and London Bank, Limited, and the question for determination is whether the money belonged to the defendant from the very beginning and, if not, whether it was gifted to him by the father. After hearing the learned Counsel on both sides we have no hesitation in holding that there is not a scintilla of evidence upon the record to support the contention that the money deposited by the father really belonged to Hamid Ullah Khan. Indeed the latter, when examined as a witness, expressed his inability to say to whom the money belonged, and we may take it that if it had been his property, he would have unhesitatingly supported his claim by making a clear and affirmative statement to that effect, and adduced evidence to show when he had paid the money to the father. It appears that on the 22nd June 1907 Sami Ullah Khan deposited the money with the Bank, and got a fixed deposit receipt payable to him, or to his son Hamid Ullah Khan, or to the survivor. The books of the Bank show that in pursuance of a direction conveyed by Sami Ullah Khan the money was made payable only to him during his lifetime, and it appears from the statement of Hargopal, a clerk employed by the Bank, that this entry was made in pursuance of a letter written by the deceased on 26th August 1907 to the Manager of the Bank. This letter (printed record, page 120) which purports to be in the handwriting of Sami Ullah Khan, states in the clearest possible terms that during his lifetime "no one was entitled to any part of the money." The admissibility of this document has been objected to by the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff did not prove the alleged signature of the writer, but this objection is clearly a belated one and cannot be allowed. The letter was not only received in evidence by the Trial Judge, but also relied upon in support of his finding, and it is significant that no objection to its admissibility was taken either in the Court of First Instance or in the memorandum of appeal to this Court. But apart from the document it is clear from the entry in the Bank's books that the deposit was payable only to the father during his lifetime.

Now the various gifts made by the father to the defendant leave no doubt whatever that the former was very kind to the latter, and we consider it most unlikely that, if the money had really belonged to his son, he would have deposited it in the joint names and claimed entire control over its disposal during his lifetime. But all doubt on this point is dispelled by the fact that there was a similar deposit made by him in the joint names of himself and the plaintiff, and it is admitted that the money due on that deposit subsequently became a part of Sami Ullah Khan's estate. It may be that the father, to avoid the payment of succession duty leviable on the Succession Certificate or Letters of Administration, asked the Bank to mention in the deposit receipt the name of the defendant along with his own, but that fact alone does not establish that he made a gift of the money. Indeed the defendant himself does not in his statement rely upon the alleged gift, and his Counsel admitted before the District Judge that there was no gift, vide, page 269, line 5. Accordingly we uphold the finding of the District Judge on this point, and reject the defendant's claim.

As regards the item of Rs. 2,000, we are unable to endorse the opinion of the Trial Judge. It is common ground that Rs. 3,000 belonging to Sami Ullah Khan were, at the time of his death, in deposit with his agent, Abdul Aziz, and there can be little doubt that the entire sum, with the exception of Rs. 30 borrowed by the plaintiff himself was spent by Abdul Aziz upon his master's funeral rites and other ceremonies usually performed on the occasion of death and thereafter. Though the plaintiff was not expressly asked to give his consent to the various items of expenditure, it appears that he was present all the time at the place where the ceremonies were being performed, and was fully cognizant of what Abdul Aziz was doing on behalf of both the brothers, but did not raise the slightest objection on the ground of the expenses being excessive or unreasonable. It is an undisputed fact that he instituted a suit against Abdul Aziz for his share of the money but failed to establish his claim. Upon these facts we do not think that the District Judge was justified in estimating the funeral expenses at Rs. 1,000 and in holding the defendant responsible for the balance. The rule of Muhammadan Law, which is in no way different from that obtaining in other systems of law, is that the funeral ceremonies should be performed in a manner suitable to the deceased's position in life and means, and it seems to us that in determining what is a reasonable amount in a particular case, the Court must take into consideration the social practices of the class to which the deceased belonged. Now, Sami Ullah Khan was a person who had occupied a high office under the Government, and was a man of position and wealth. It is true that he had, during his lifetime transferred by gift the major portion of the property to his elder son, but that circumstance did in no way interfere with the position he occupied in society. His heirs were expected to perform in a suitable manner the different ceremonies usual on an occasion of this kind, and the reasonableness of the amount actually spent is demonstrated by the fact that the elder son expressly authorised it, and the younger one, though he saw the various sums being spent on different ceremonies, never expressed his disapproval or suggested in any way that the expenditure was unreasonable or unnecessary. In a matter of this character the conduct of the parties is a very important piece of evidence, and in view of the plaintiff's acquiescence and other circumstances we consider that he cannot now reasonably ask the Court to reduce the sum which has been expended, or to make the defendant personally responsible for the alleged excessive expenditure.

The question of wakf in respect of six shops in Gali Batasha at Delhi need not detain us long. In support of his contention that the property was endowed by his father for the purpose of carrying out certain trusts the defendant places his reliance upon a letter dated the 10th of December 1894 written to him by the father and the draft of a deed of settlement. The letter in question contains a vague reference to Sami Ullah's intention to plant a garden near the tomb of his deceased wife, the defendant's mother, and advises the defendant to set apart some money for the benefit of their souls. The document was written in 1894, and it is significant that though the writer lived for nearly fourteen years thereafter, he did not take any steps to carry out his alleged intention. There is no mention therein of the property upon which the defendant seeks to impose the trust. As to the draft of the deed of settlement, Exhibit D-10 it will suffice to say that it does not bear any date, is not in the deceased's hand writing, and does not bear even his signature. Now, the deceased, who was a Judicial Officer of experience, must have been fully aware of the importance of a document to prove the nature of a transaction of this kind, and yet we are told that he ordered his servant Abdul Aziz to prepare a draft sometime in 1907 or 1908, but did not take any steps to execute a regular conveyance. Under the Muhammadan law no formality is required to be gone through for the purpose of creating a valid wakf; it is enough if the donor declares that he constitutes a property wakf or has constituted it wakf. It is, however, clear that there must be not only a mere intention to dedicate property but an actual dedication. Now, in the present case, as pointed out above, there is no documentary evidence to satisfy the above test, and the oral evidence of Rafi-ud-din, a witness for the defendant, only shows that the intention of the deceased was to make wakf a portion of his property. He desired to make wakf for the spiritual welfare of religious preceptors, himself and his dear ones. The contents of the draft D-10 almost represent his views". Whatever may be said as to the intention, it cannot be held that Sami Ullah dedicated the property in question or made any declaration of trust in respect thereof.

The next three items of properties have certain common features which may be mentioned briefly. These properties form the subject-matter of three deeds of gift executed by Sami Ullah in favour of his elder son, and the execution of the documents has not been contested before us. It appears that neither at the time of the execution, nor at the time of the registration, of the instruments the donor and the donee met each other, the former being at Ali-garh and the latter at Hyderabad; and it is, therefore, argued by Mr. Moti Sagar for the plaintiff that to constitute a valid gift under the Muhammadan Law it is essential that the donor and the donee must come together and meet each other, and that in the absence of a meeting the gift is invalid. The learned Pleader invites our attention to a passage in Hedaya at page 482 which is in the following terms :

"A gift may be taken possession of on the spot where it is tendered, without the express order of the donor but not afterwards. If the donee take possession of the gift, in the meeting of the deed of gift, without the order of the giver, it is lawful, upon a favourable construction. If, on the contrary, he should take possession of the gift after the breaking up of the meeting, it is not lawful, unless he have had the consent of the giver so to do."

Baillie in his Digest of Muhammadan Law lays down a rule to the same effect, vide page 513 ;

"When the donee is neither expressly permitted nor forbidden to take possession, and does so at the meeting, the possession is valid on a favourable construction of law, though not so by analogy. But if possession is not taken till after separation from the meeting, the possession is not valid, either by analogy or on a favourable construction."

These extracts, no doubt, refer to the meeting of the donor and the donee but it is nowhere stated that if the parties do not come face to face, there cannot be any valid gift by the one to the other. The learned Pleader is unable to cite any judicial authority in support of his contention and we do not think that the passages quoted above make it a sine qua non to the validity of the gift that the donor and the donee must meet each other. The rule of the Muhammadan Law on the subject of the delivery of seisin should be interpreted in the light of common sense and according to the exigencies and necessities of modern life. Surely it cannot be seriously argued that a father is unable to make a valid gift in favour of his son who happens to be absent at that time.

The three essentials of gift under the Muhammadan Law are : offer by the donor, acceptance by or on behalf of the donee, and seisin. An offer may be accepted either by the donee himself or by his agent, and it is nowhere laid down in so many terms that the donor and the donee must be present at one and the same place. As regards the delivery of possession what the law contemplates is that the possession required to be given must be such as the nature of the property permits. If the donor has done all that he could do to perfect the contemplated gift, which is attended with complete publicity, the mere fact that the donee was not present or that possession was obtained by him some time after does not invalidate the transfer.

Now, the District Judge has held that there was delivery of possession in respect of items Nos. (e) and (f) referred to above, but there was no such delivery in respect of item (d); and the question arises whether his findings are justified by the facts and the law bearing on the subject. The shops in Chandni Chank, item (e), were in possession of tenants at the time of the gift, and several leases have been produced to show that after the registration of the deed of gift in 1906 the lessees attorned to the donee, and the finding on this point arrived at by the District Judge in favour of the defendant is not contested by the learned Pleader for the plaintiff. It is, however, urged that the ownership of tangible property in possession of a tenant cannot be transferred by way of gift unless and until the donor evicts the tenant, obtains physical possession of the property, and then delivers it to the donee.

Now, we are fully aware of certain passages in Dur-ul-Mukhtar and Fatawa-i-Alamgiri, which are usually cited in support of this extreme view. Whatever the exact significance of these passages may be, there can be no manner of doubt that this view has not been accepted by any judicial authority or any modern author on Muhammadan Law. The judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Mullick Abdool Guffoor v. Muleka (5) has settled the question beyond any reasonable doubt, and contains the following pertinent observations with respect to these texts: "We have been referred to several authorities, and amongst others, to Dur-ul-Mukhtar, Book on Gift, page 635, which lays down that no gift can be valid unless the subject of it is in the possession of the donor at the time when the gift is made. Thus when land is in the possession of a usurper (or wrong doer), or of a lessee or mortgagee, it cannot be given away; because in these cases the donor has not possession of the thing which he purports to give. But we think that this rule, which is undoubtedly laid down in several works of more or less authority, must, so far as it relates to land, have relation to cases where the donor professes to give away the possessory interest in the land itself, and not merely a reversionary right in it." Then after suggesting another explanation, the Court proceeds: "Whether this is the real meaning of the authorities, may be doubtful; but it is certain that such a state of the law in this country would render the transfer by gift of a zemindari or other landlord's interest simply impossible; lands here are almost always let out on leases of some kind, and there are often four or five different grades of tenants between the zemindar and the occupying ryot. What is usually called possession in this country is not actual or khas possession, but the receipt of the rents and profits; and if lands let on lease could not be made the subject of a gift, many thousands of gifts, which have been made over and over again of zemindari properties, would be invalidated. If we were disposed to agree with this novel view of Muhammadan Law (which we are not) we think we should be doing a great wrong to the Muhammadan community, by placing them under disabilities with regard to the transfer of property, which they have never hitherto experienced in this country. Such a view of the law is quite inconsistent with several cases decided by the Suddar Dewany Adawlut (under the advice of the Kazis) and also by this Court, and it is directly opposed to the case of Ameeroonnissa Khatoon v. Abedoonnissa Khatoon (6) decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council."

The exposition of law contained in this judgment has our entire concurrence, and upon the rule laid down therein we have no hesitation in holding that the possession of the property in the occupation of a tenant can be delivered by allowing the donee to collect rents and profits or by requesting the tenant to attorn to the donee. The same view has been taken by the Bombay High Court in Shaik Ibrahim v. Shaik Suleman (7) and Khaver Sultan v. Rukha Sultan (8). Mr. Moti Sagar frankly admits that there is not a single judgment laying down the opposite rule, and we must accordingly hold that the attornment by the tenants to the donee and the collection of rents by the latter constituted a valid delivery of possession in respect of the Chandni Chauk property, and that the gift thereof was a valid transaction and cannot be disputed.

The deed in respect of the plot of land in Darya Ganj was executed on the 9th of February 1908 and registered on the 10th March 1908, namely, a month before the death of the donor. It recites the delivery of possession, and considering that the property was a vacant plot of land, we do not think that the donor was expected to do anything else to perfect the title of the donee. Neither any tenant nor anybody else was in physical possession of the property, and it is quite clear that the donor ceased to exercise any right of ownership therein. It is a legitimate inference, though there is no direct evidence on the point, that the donee's agent at Delhi began to hold the land after the registration of the instrument, and we think that there was such a delivery of seisin as the nature of the property permitted.

Coming to the third property, which was the subject-matter of a deed of gift executed on the 9th of October 1905 and registered on the 6th November 1905, we notice that the learned District Judge has held the gift to be invalid because it was not perfected by delivery of possession, such as it is contemplated by Muhammadan Law. Now, the execution of the deed is admitted, and it appears that Sami Ullah Khan sent the document to Delhi, where the property was situate, for registration there, and that the registration was effected through his attorney Abdul Aziz. The instrument recites that the donor had surrendered possession and delivered it to the donee, and though such a recital is sometimes a purely formal affair, all the circumstances show that the donor ceased thereafter to have control over the property and that the donee stepped into his shoes. The property was assessed by the Municipal Committee to house-tax, and the document printed at pages 92 and 93 of the paper-book shows that in the house-tax register kept by the Municipal Committee mutation of names was effected in favour of Hamid Ullah Khan. The plaintiff himself as a witness admits, vide page 195, that his father Sami Ullah Khan placed on the main gate of the house a tablet-bearing the name "Hamid Manzil," and the witness refers to Hashmat Ullah as the person having knowledge on the subject. The latter's evidence shows that the father placed the tablet with the inscription thereon in order to show to the whole world that the property belonged to Hamid-Ullah. It is fully proved that the house-tax with respect to this property was paid in 1907 and 1908 by the donee and not by the donor (vide pages 62 and 130), at the time of the gift the tenement consisted of three parts, namely, the residential house, a vacant site, and some shops. It is established that on the vacant site the donee built a house called Nimwali haveli that the application for permission to build was made on his behalf, and that the sanction was granted to him. There is some evidence that the tenants occupying the shops paid rent to the donee, and the fact that the leases relating to the shops are not forthcoming does not necessarily show that the tenants did not attorn to him. It is further clear that he demolished the shops and built a room on the site. As regards the residential portion it appears that neither the donor nor the donee was in occupation thereof at the time of the gift, but the mutation of names in the Municipal register and the placing of tablet referred to above and other circumstances show that the donee was in constructive possession thereof.

The learned District Judge bases his conclusion mainly upon two points, first, that Hashmat Ullah, the defendant's agent, deposes that Sami Ullah Khan, when asked to deliver possession of the property, replied "that he was a fool to take possession from owners." Now the word 'owners' is not quite a correct translation of the word gharwalon used in the vernacular, and it seems to us, that Sami Ullah Khan in using the expression was referring to his female relatives then occupying some rooms in the house. We do not think that it was essential to the transfer of possession that these ladies should have vacated the house. The second matter referred to by the learned Judge is that the plaintiff and his wife occupied some rooms in the house; but it is admitted before us that the plaintiff's marriage took place in 1907, and the defendant states that he himself asked his brother to leave the house of his father-in-law and come over and reside in the house in dispute. There is no adequate ground for rejecting this testimony, and in the circumstances the possession of the plaintiff must be deemed to be permissive and on behalf of the defendant.

Considering all the facts and the statements of the parties we are of opinion that the father did all he could reasonably do to deliver possession of the property to the donee and that the latter became full owner thereof.

The last item of property is the Government promissory notes of Rs. 30,000 and the essentials of gift with respect to it have, in our opinion, been established beyond all doubt. It is quite clear that Sami Ullah Khan sold an immoveable property called mazid parcha, utilized part of the price in purchasing the notes through Delhi and London Bank in 1906, and directed the Bank to endorse the notes in favour of the defendant. This direction was duly carried out, and the notes were sent to the defendant, and indeed the plaintiff himself does not dispute these facts. He, however, contends that the purchase of the notes was a benami transaction and that the father remained owner thereof all along. But all doubt on this point is set at rest by the father's letter Exhibit D-25 dated the 25th of April 1906 to the defendant, which may be quoted in extenso:—

"I give you Rs. 30,000 out of the sale proceeds of the mazid parcha. The money has been sent to you in notes through the Bank. I give away this to you by way of gift and not as an heir. Succession opens after the death of an ancestor. You should keep this letter with care."

This letter fully establishes the gift, and it is undeniable that the delivery of notes in pursuance thereof was made to the defendant.

The above discussion concludes the determination of all the points argued before us by the learned Counsel on both sides, and the result is that we dismiss Civil Appeal No. 1510 of 1914, and accepting Civil Appeal No. 1439 of 1914 we exclude Rs. 2,000 and the house described as Hamiā Manzil from the list of the properties to be partitioned between the brothers. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case we leave the parties to bear their own costs in both the Courts.

Appeal No. 1510 of 1914 dismissed.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 55—Mortgage of agricultural land—Redemption to be had in Khali fasl jeth—Time, whether essence of contract.

In cases of mortgage with possession in respect of agricultural land, providing for redemption only at a particular season of the year known as khali fasl Jeth, time is of the essence of the contract, and the mortgagor, in order to maintain a suit for redemption, must show that he made a full offer to redeem in khali fasl Jeth and that such offer was refused. JUDGMENT.—The argument for the plaintiff-appellant in this case is that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in dismissing the suit brought by him for redemption. In order to understand the point so raised it is necessary to refer to a few facts. The plaintiff in the case is a second mortgagee. The earlier mortgage of the property had been made in favour of two persons Rahim Bakhsh and Idu. That mortgage was a mortgage with possession, the mortgage money advanced being a sum of Rs. 500. The mortgage-deed provides for redemption in "khali fasl Jeth." The plaintiff having obtained the second mortgage of the property is entitled to seek redemption and in his plaint he stated that he had made an offer to the prior mortgagees which had been accepted by them. In the third paragraph of the plaint it is stated that Rs. 420 out of Rs. 500 had been paid to the first defendant and that Rs. 80 had been paid to the second defendant on the 7th of June 1914. The plaintiff alleged that after these payments had been made he had got back the mortgage-deed from the defendants who had agreed to his taking possession. He went on to allege that sometime after the month of Asarh when he wanted to take possession the defendants refused to deliver it to him. The first defendant confessed judgment. He admitted that he had received the sum of Rs. 420 from the plaintiff. The second defendant Idu denied that any payment of Rs. 80 had been made to him and it has been found as a matter of fact by both the Courts below that no such payment was made. It has further been found that the plaintiff got possession of the mortgage-deed acting in collusion with the first defendant. The case for the second defendant is that his share of the mortgage-money was not for Rs. 80 as alleged in plaint but Rs. 200 as set out in the mortgage-deed. The learned District Judge relying upon the decision of a Bench of the Allahabad High Court reported as Muhammad Ali v. Baldeo Pande (1) came to the conclusion that as it was proved that no adequate tender of the mortgage-money had been made the plaintiff had no cause of action for his suit for redemption. It has been contended here that this view of the law taken by the Allahabad High Court has not been accepted in this Court and reliance has been placed upon two judgments which are to be found in Barma Bakhsh v. Suraj Singh (2) and Sidh Gopal v. Nanhu Khan (3). It is true that in both of those cases it has been laid down that there can be no hard and fast rule that a mortgagor cannot maintain a suit for redemption except on proof that he has tendered to the mortgagee the sum due to him. Instances have been cited in both these reported cases in which redemption has been allowed although no tender had been made. The present case however, appears to me to be of a different nature. The mortgage as I have said was a mortgage with possession providing for redemption only at that particular season of the year which is known as khali fasl Jeth. As has been said in some of the Allahabad rulings, in a case of this kind time is of the essence of the contract and the mortgagor in order to maintain a suit for redemption has to show that he made an offer to redeem in khali fasl Jeth and that such offer was refused. In the present instance it has been proved that no proper tender of the money was made. On the finding of the Court below all that was tendered was a sum of Rs. 420. It is not open to the mortgagor to say that he was in doubt as to the proper amount of tender, for that is perfectly plain having regard to the terms of the deed. The only sum which could be payable is a sum of Rs. 500. As for proportion in which the original mortgagees are to receive their money, that is another matter, and does not seem to me in any way to concern the present plaintiff. He could have easily overcome any difficulty by going to Court and making a deposit of Rs. 500 under the provisions of section 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, leaving it for the mortgagees themselves to divide the money as they thought proper. I think there can be no doubt that what has happened in this case is that the plaintiff has entered into collusion with one of the mortgagees and that this suit was a collusive suit. I am not prepared, therefore, to interfere with the judgment of the Court below. I think the suit was rightly dismissed. The plaintiff will be entitled to redeem the property if he seeks redemption in the proper way by making a full tender at the proper time of the year.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

versus

G. C. SETT AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 56—Performance rendered impossible by outbreak of war—Rights and liabilities of parties—Contract of affreightment with alien enemy before war, whether subsists after outbreak of war—C. I. F. contract, incidents of—Executory contract, dissolution of—Estoppel—Vendor and purchaser.

Under a C. I. F. contract the defendants (vendors) sent out an order to Europe for supply of certain goods to the plaintiffs (purchasers) in Calcutta. The goods were shipped on the 2nd July 1914 in a German vessel which was on the high seas when war broke out between England and Germany, and the vessel was captured by the Government as an enemy ship and brought before the Ceylon Court of Admiralty. On the 25th August 1914 the ship was condemned as a lawful prize, but the cargo was released on condition that on its conveyance by the Crown to its destination the Crown would be authorised to recover certain expenses against the cargo released and delivered in Calcutta. On the arrival of the goods in Calcutta, the defendants asked the plaintiffs to take delivery on payment of those expenses. On the plaintiffs' refusal to do so the defendants disposed of the goods in the market, whereupon the plaintiffs instituted a suit for recovery of damages for failure of the defendants to deliver the goods in terms of the contract:

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover damages, as the contract between them and the defendants became void under section 56 of the Contract Act, inasmuch as by the outbreak of the war, one essential element of the contract, namely the contract of affreightment, became unlawful and the fact that the defendants at one stage offered to deliver the goods to the plaintiffs on certain terms did not estop them from pleading that the contract had become void under section 56 of the Contract Act. [p. 388, cols. 1 & 2; p. 392, cols. 1 & 2.]

The incidents of a C. I. F. contract explained. [p. 387, col. 1; p. 390, col. 1.]

An executory contract made with an alien enemy in peace time is avoided or dissolved by the outbreak of war, if it enures to the aid of the enemy or if it is in its nature incapable of suspension. [p. 390, col. 2.]

A contract is deemed in its nature incapable of suspension, if its proper performance necessitates intercourse with the enemy during the war or where time is of the essence of the contract, or the parties cannot on the restoration of peace be put on a footing of equality. [p. 390, col. 2.]

A contract of affreightment may be dissolved without execution not only by act of the parties, but in many cases, by the act of the law. If the voyage becomes unlawful or impossible to be performed, or if it is broken up, either before or after it has actually commenced, by war or interdiction, complete or partial of commerce with the place of destination, the contract is dissolved. [p. 391, col. 1.]

Per Mookerjee, J.—Where a ship is condemned as a prize but the cargo is released, the Crown is entitled to impose the payment of freight as a condition of its release and has a lien on the goods till it is paid. [p. 392, col. 1.]

The ultimate conveyance of the goods by the condemned ship to its destination is in no sense a continuation of the original voyage in fulfilment of the contract of affreightment but is essentially a new voyage under new conditions. [p. 392, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the defendants Madhoram Hurdeo Dass against the decision of Chaudhuri, J., whereby he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for Rs. 2,500 as damages for breach of contract and costs.

The contract was contained in a letter written by the defendants to the plaintiff, and dated 2nd February 1914, as follows:—

Calcutta, 2nd February 1914.

"MESSRS. G. C. SETT & B. R. SETT, Calcutta.

"DEAR SIRS,
We beg to enter as having sold you through Broker P. N. Mookerjee 150 tons Basic Steel bars with usual 10 per cent. 2nd class extras at £ 5-7-6 per ton C. I. F. i.e., free Hooghly. Shipment in three monthly lots commencing June, i.e., June, July, August 1914. Delivery to be completed within three days from the date of the landing of the goods. Terms 45 days credit from the date of the delivery of the goods, failing which due date will be calculated from the due date of the delivery, i.e., three days of the landing of the goods.

This sale is made on the basis of the existing terms and conditions in the contracts for this class of goods as are current in the market. Interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum to be charged on any money unpaid after the due date and rebate for payments before the due date will be allowed at the same rates. You have the option to have the goods weighed so as to arrive at the actual weightment and in that case you shall have to notify us, so that we may make necessary arrangements to have our man present. But in any case, claim for weightment will not be entertained, if made after three days after the arrival of the goods in your godowns from the jetty, and the invoice weight shall be accepted by you as the correct one.

Please confirm.

Yours faithfully

MADHORAM HURDEODASS.

The July consignment was shipped by the Belgo-Asiatic Trading Company, from whom the defendants had bought the goods, on the 2nd July 1914 at Antwerp on board the ss. "Steinturn" which was a German vessel. Some of the goods were made in Belgium, others were made in Germany as appears from the invoices in respect of the goods. Neither the Bill of Lading nor the Policy of Insurance was produced in Court, but it was assumed for the purpose of the appeal by both sides that the Bill of Lading was made out in the name of the defendants and that the contingency which happened, viz., the capture and condemnation of the ship and the consequent expenses were not covered by the Policy of Insurance.

At the time of the declaration of war against Germany, namely on the 4th August 1914, the "Steinturn" was at sea, and at sometime subsequently, which has not been proved, she was captured by a British ship and taken to Colombo. The "Steinturn" was condemned by the Prize Court but the cargo in question was released, and inasmuch as the ship was carrying a general cargo consigned to Madras, Calcutta and Chittagong, it was ordered on the 19th November 1914 by the Prize Court that in the event of the Crown in the exercise of its power under a previous order, dated 2nd September 1914, consigning the said cargo to Madras and Calcutta—the Crown be authorised to recover against all cargo released and delivered at Madras and Calcutta in respect of freight Rs. 15.50 per ton and in respect of agency charges such reasonable expenses as might be incurred.

Consequently the consignment in question was carried in the "Steinturn" under the above mentioned order and arrangement to Calcutta and arrived there on or about the 2nd January 1915. The freight for the carriage from Colombo to Calcutta was Rs. 818.14.0 as is shewn from the bill dated the 23rd February 1915, in addition there were Rs. 82 for charges in respect of release from the Prize Court and other expenses in consequence of the capture of the "Steinturn" and the conveyance of the cargo from Colombo to Calcutta.

The course of events may be taken from the learned Judge's summary of what he describes as the undisputed facts of the case as follows:—

"That the plaintiffs failed to pay the price of the June shipment and a suit had to be instituted against them which was decreed on the 26th January 1915: That copies of three invoices were sent to the plaintiffs by the defendant firm of the goods per ss. Steinturn. In or about the end of September 1914, the defendant firm asked the plaintiffs to keep themselves in readiness to pay for the goods in cash against shipping documents on arrival of the steamer. See their letter dated 24/30th September 1914. Apparently there was a mistake in the invoice as regards the weight, and the plaintiffs called upon the defendants to correct it, but the defendants stated that they were not liable to make any corrections. On the 2nd January 1915 the defendant firm intimated to the plaintiffs that the vessel had arrived in Port and requested them to take delivery of the goods by paying for them as early as possible. The cause of late arrival was the seizure of the steamer at Colombo.

By an order dated 25th August 1914 on the application of the Crown, the steamer was handed over by the Colombo Prize Court to the custody of the principal

MADHORAM HURDEODASS v. G. C. SETT.

Collector of Customs, and the following undertaking and decree was entered on record, namely, "the Solicitor General on behalf of the Crown undertakes that the Crown will restore the ship to its present place, whenever it is called upon to do so by this Court, if the Government of Ceylon on behalf of the Crown are allowed to take charge of the ship, and moves that the Crown be allowed to take charge of the ship, on these terms. It is ordered and decreed that the application be allowed and that the Marshal be directed to let the Government of Ceylon have possession of the ship, after the cargo, goods, wares and merchandise have been warehoused. It is further directed that the Marshal shall require from any person taking over the ship on behalf of the Government an authority to do so signed by His Excellency the Governor or by the Colonial Secretary." The President of the Prize Court appears to have made an order on the 19th November 1914 that inasmuch as the steamer contained general cargo sent to Madras, Calcutta and Chittagong, it was for the interest of all persons concerned that the cargo entitled to release, which was consigned to Calcutta, should be delivered at Calcutta; it was further ordered that "in the event of the Crown in the exercise of its powers conveying the said cargo to Calcutta, the Crown was authorised to recover against all cargo released and delivered certain expenses, namely,

"In respect of freight Rs. 15.50 per ton weight or measure. In respect of agency charges, such reasonable expenses as may be incurred."

"And that the steamer was not to depart from Colombo until after the expiration of three weeks from the date of that order."

On the 2nd September 1914 the Prize Court on hearing the Attorney-General made the following order, "that the Marshal be authorized for the purpose of warehousing the cargo to put the cargo in the hands of the Crown, the Attorney-General undertaking on behalf of the Crown that in the event of the cargo or any part of it being removed out of the jurisdiction of this Court, it was to be brought back within the jurisdiction upon the order of the Court." What happened was that Messrs. Graham & Co., merchants of Calcutta, were employed as agents on behalf of the Crown to give delivery of the goods consigned to Calcutta to the consignees. Graham & Co., thereupon, communicated with the defendant firm in respect of the July shipment of the goods which had come out in that steamer, and these goods arrived, as stated above, on the 2nd January. The defendant firm had to pay certain charges for freight and commission to Messrs. Graham & Co. for these goods. The defendants allege that by the said letter dated 23rd February 1915, they gave particulars of the costs and charges incurred by them in respect of the consignment, including therein the charges occasioned by the seizure and release. That prior to that date and after the arrival of the goods in Calcutta some correspondence ensued. The defendant firm wrote to the plaintiffs on the 4th January 1915, that unless the plaintiff firm immediately sent the price of the goods of the June shipment which had already been delivered to them, as also the price of the goods per ss. "Steinturn", they would be compelled to re-sell the goods on the plaintiffs' account. The plaintiffs wrote on the same date that they were prepared to pay for and take delivery of all the goods with the exception of 22 pieces of Basic Steel bars, the weight of which had been incorrectly stated in the invoice. They said that if they (defendants) failed to make over the Bill of Lading for the goods they would not be liable for any wharf rent, if incurred. On the 8th January the plaintiffs said that they were prepared to pay the full price of the three lots which had come per ss. "Steinturn" on the defendant firm handing over to them the Bills of Lading and other documents. They offered to pay the necessary charges for obtaining delivery of the goods from the jetties, and asked for information as to the exact amount payable by them. There was no reply to this letter. On the 19th January they offered Rs. 4,370 as being the price of the goods including the usual charges. On the 27th January Charu Chandra Bose, Attorney for the defendants, wrote to the plaintiffs' Attorneys the following letter:—"As arranged my clients are now ready to deliver the goods demanded by you on receipt of the price, godown rent and charges." It will be noticed this letter was written the day after the decree above referred to. It was a consent decree and the defendants say that terms arranged between the parties were that the goods of the July shipment would be taken delivery of by the plaintiffs after payment of all dues, that Nepal Chunder on behalf of the plaintiffs agreed to pay all costs in respect of the July shipment, freight, etc., that is to say, the extra freight and other charges incurred in respect of the consignment. This arrangement is entirely denied by the plaintiffs. No reply was sent by the plaintiffs to that letter until the 4th February 1915, when they said that nothing had been arranged as suggested by the defendants. They said that the defendants were not entitled to godown rent, and refused to pay same. They complained that the defendants had not specified what charges they were claiming, and expressed their readiness and willingness to pay the price of the goods and the duty, landing and proper charges in respect thereof as were usual in the case of delivery ex-jetty. On the 4th February the defendants' Attorney said that if the goods were not taken delivery of within three days, the defendants would re-sell on the plaintiffs' account. Apparently these two letters crossed each other. On the 9th February the defendant firm said that the price and charges to be paid were mentioned in their bills sent to the plaintiffs. Over and above that, the plaintiffs would have to pay godown rent and cartage for the removal of the goods and unless the plaintiffs took delivery of the goods within three days, the defendants would re-sell the goods on the plaintiffs' account and risk. On the 12th January the plaintiffs denied that any bills had been submitted to them for payment and refused to pay godown rent and other incidental charges. Nothing further was done by the plaintiffs until the 8th March, when their Attorneys wrote a letter to the defendants' Attorney asking for a statement of the charges the defendants claimed in respect of the said goods and if they found the same reasonable and proper, they would ask the plaintiffs to take delivery. On the 10th March they were informed that the defendants had sold the goods to a third person.

The action was brought for breach of contract caused by the failure of the defendants to make over the Bill of Lading or to deliver the goods, and the main point which was urged in this appeal was not taken by the defendants until the trial, when the learned Judge allowed the defendants to amend their defence as follows:—

"With further reference to paragraph 3 of the plaint herein the defendant firm state that the goods forming the July shipment referred to in the said paragraph were shipped from Antwerp on or about the 2nd day of July 1914 per ss. "Steinturn". On the outbreak of war between His Britannic Majesty's Government and the German Empire on the 4th day of August 1914 the said steamer, which was on the high seas, became liable to seizure by the naval forces of His Majesty's Government and as a matter of fact the said steamer was captured, seized and detained by His Majesty's Government at or near Colombo and was subsequently condemned with all the cargo on board by the Colombo Prize Court. The defendant firm submit that on such condemnation of the said steamer and of the cargo therein including the said goods, the contract with the plaintiffs became impossible of performance."

It is clear from the order of the Prize Court that though the ship was condemned, the cargo in question was not condemned. It was, however, argued that although the cargo was eventually released the outbreak of war rendered the performance of the contract of 2nd February 1914 impossible or at all events it rendered the contract of affreightment, which was an implied part of the contract, unlawful and consequently by reason of the provision of section 56 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, the contract was void.

This defence necessitated an examination of the terms of the contract.

After some discussion during the argument it appeared that there was little, if any, material difference between the interpretations placed upon the contract by the learned Counsel appearing for the plaintiffs and defendants; and both argued the case on the assumption that the contract was an ordinary C.I.F. contract, with this variation that the payment specified in the contract was not to be made as usual against the documents and was not to be made in this case until 43 days after the landing of the goods, that having regard to the special terms of this contract it was not the duty of the defendants to hand over the documents relating to the goods as soon as the documents arrived but that they were entitled to retain them until the goods arrived, when it would be the duty of the defendants to hand over the documents to the plaintiffs for the purpose of taking delivery or for the defendants to take delivery themselves in the first instance and that payment would become due 48 days after the landing of the goods.

The question, therefore, arises what were the incidents of the defendants' undertaking in such a contract: The variation of the terms as to the time of payment does not in my judgment alter the nature of the contract as C.I.F. contract.

Taking the well-known incidents of such a contract the defendants' had, firstly, to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract, secondly, to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods would be delivered in the Hooghly; thirdly, to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade which would be available for the benefit of the buyers; fourthly, to make out an invoice; and finally, to tender these documents and by reason of the special terms of this contract, to tender such documents upon the arrival of the goods.

It may be assumed for the purpose of this case that the goods were of the description contained in the contract and that a contract of affreightment was procured under which in ordinary circumstances the goods would have been delivered in the Hooghly and that a sufficient insurance was arranged.

But it was argued on behalf of the defendants that although the goods eventually arrived and were capable of physical delivery in the Hooghly, they did not so arrive under the contract of affreightment procured by them in pursuance of their contract of 2nd February 1914 with the plaintiffs, that the original contract of affreightment of which the Bill of Lading was evidence came to an end as soon as war broke out, that though the goods were in fact carried by the "Steinturn" to the Hooghly, they were carried by her, after she had been condemned by the Prize Court in Ceylon and under an arrangement made in pursuance of an order of that Court, by which further freight and expenses became charged upon the cargo, and that inasmuch as the defendants could not deliver the goods under the original contract of affreightment the performance of their contract was impossible.

In my judgment this contention should be adopted: It was an implied part of the contract of 2nd February 1914 that the defendants should procure a contract of affreightment, under which the goods would be delivered in the Hooghly. That contract of affreightment was procured, and it was represented by the Bill of Lading in the name of the defendants.

But the operation of war on such a contract of affreightment made before, but which remained unexecuted at the time war was declared, made the further execution, so far as the defendants, British subjects, were concerned, unlawful, it being a contract with an alien enemy, and the contract of affreightment thereby became dissolved. Esposito v. Bowden (1).

Further the capture of ss. "Steinturn" prevented the delivery of the goods under the contract of affreightment procured by the defendants in pursuance of their contract with the plaintiffs, and the goods could not be delivered in the Hooghly except by the payment of further freight and expenses which by the order of the Prize Court in Ceylon had become charged on the goods.

The Bill of Lading which under a C. I. F. contract is tendered by the seller to the buyer would be such as would procure delivery of the goods from the ship. In this case the Bill of Lading, if tendered by the defendants, would not by itself have enabled the plaintiffs to obtain delivery of the goods from the ship. Something more would have been necessary to enable the plaintiffs to get delivery, viz., the authority of the agents of the Crown, which authority could only be obtained by the payment of the freight from Colombo to the Hooghly and certain other charges.

For these reasons it appears to me that the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants included the performance of an act (viz., the procuring the contract of affreightment under which the goods would be delivered in the Hooghly), which after the contract was made became impossible by reason of the outbreak of the war, within the meaning of section 56 of the Indian Contract Act and consequently the contract of 2nd February 1914 was void.

I think also that the procuring of the further execution of the contract of affreightment, which was an implied part of the contract of 2nd February 1914, became unlawful by reason of an event which the defendants could not prevent, viz., the outbreak of war and consequently the contract of 2nd February 1914 became void by reason of the provisions of section 56.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiffs pressed us with the argument that the property in the goods had not passed to the plaintiffs, by reason of the fact that no appropriation of these goods, to which the plaintiffs assented, to the contract in question had taken place until August or September 1915, i.e., after the capture and condemnation of the ss. "Steinturn" and that the plaintiffs' contract, therefore, was not affected by the fact that the goods had been carried in a German vessel at the outbreak of war.

I do not think it is necessary to express any opinion on this point, for in my judgment it is immaterial to the question whether the performance of an integral part of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was rendered impossible or unlawful by the outbreak of war.

It was further urged that the contract of affreightment did not relate to the goods, the subject-matter of the contract of 2nd February 1914. This point, as far as I understand, was not raised at the trial, and I think there can be no doubt that the contract of affreightment did in fact relate to the goods the subject-matter of the contract.

But then it was said, even if that be so in point of fact, it cannot be said in law that the contract of affreightment was in pursuance of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants until something is done which binds the plaintiffs, such as assent by the plaintiffs.

Having regard to what I consider is the material question in this case, as intimated already, I cannot agree to the last proposition. I think the assent of the plaintiffs was immaterial and it was merely a question of fact whether the contract of affreightment did really relate to the subject-matter of the contract of 2nd February 1914 and having regard to the date of the invoice, the description and quantities of the goods contained therein, there can be no doubt that in point of fact the contract of affreightment related to the subject-matter of the contract of 2nd February 1914.

As already stated, the defendants did not take up the position now relied upon until the trial of the action, and the defendants on the 2nd January 1915 had called on the plaintiffs to take delivery. It was contended that the defendants by reason of such action were estopped from relying on the above-mentioned defence.

The plaintiffs were not able to point to any respect in which they had altered their position by reason of the alleged representation of the defendants that they were in a position to give delivery in accordance with the contract, and I do not think that the defendants are estopped from taking the defence upon which they now rely. That defence, for the reasons given above, is, in my judgment, a good one, and, therefore, this appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants with costs in this Court and in the Court of first instance.

Any extra costs necessitated by the amendment of the defence or costs thrown away by reason thereof to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

Money in Court to be paid out to the defendants.

MOOKERJEE, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit for damages for breach of contract. On the 2nd February 1914, the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 150 tons Basic Steel bars to be shipped in June, July and August 1914 in equal proportions. The terms of the contract were set out as follows in a letter addressed by the defendants to the plaintiffs:—

"We beg to enter as having sold you, through broker, P. N. Mookerjee, 150 tons Basic Steel bars, with usual 10 per cent. second class extra, at £5-7-6. per ton, C. I. F., i. e., free Hooghly. Shipment in three monthly lots, commencing June, i. e., June, July and August 1914. Delivery to be completed within three days from the date of the landing of the goods. Terms 45 days credit from the date of the delivery of the goods, failing which, due date will be calculated from the due date of the delivery, i. e., three days from the landing of the goods. This sale is made on the basis of the existing terms and conditions in the contracts for this class of goods as are current in the market. Interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum to be charged on any money unpaid after the due date, and rebate for payments before the due date will be allowed at the same rate. You have the option to have the goods weighed so as to arrive at the actual weighment, and in that case you shall have to notify us, so that we may make necessary arrangements to have our man present. But, in any case, claim for weighment will not be entertained, if made after three days after the arrival of the goods in your godowns from the jetty, and the invoice weight shall be accepted by you as the correct one. Please confirm."

On the 14th February 1914, the plaintiffs supplied the specifications; and on the 19th February, the defendants sent out an order to the Belgo Asiatic Trading Co. of Brussels for supply of the goods, which were partly of Belgian and partly of German manufacture. The June shipment was received by the defendants in due course and was delivered to the plaintiffs. We are now concerned with the July shipment. The goods were shipped from Antwerp on the 2nd July 1914 in ss. "Steinturn" a German steamer which was on the high seas when war broke out between England and Germany on the 4th August 1914. The ship was captured by the naval forces of His Majesty as an enemy ship, and was brought before the Ceylon Court of Admiralty. On the 25th August 1914, the ship was condemned as lawful prize, but the cargo was released. On the 19th November 1914, the Prize Court ordered that, in the event of the Crown conveying the cargo to destination, the Crown be authorised to recover against all cargo released and delivered at Calcutta the following expenses, namely Rs. 15'50 in respect of freight per ton weight or measure, and such reasonable expenses as may be incurred in respect of agency charges. The Government of Ceylon took possession of the cargo on behalf of the Crown, and Graham & Co. were employed to act as their agents. The goods arrived in Calcutta on the 2nd January 1915 and the defendants took delivery on payment of freight and agency charges to Graham & Co. Meanwhile, the defendants had, on the 30th September 1914, intimated to the plaintiffs that they had received invoices for the goods (copies whereof were enclosed); no mention, however, was made of the seizure of the ship; indeed, there is nothing to show that either party was, at that date, aware of what had happened. On arrival of the goods in Calcutta, there was some controversy between the parties as to whether the plaintiffs or the defendants were liable to bear the charges imposed by the Prize Court. The plaintiffs denied their liability in this respect, with the result that the defendants disposed of the goods in the market. On the 18th March 1915, the plaintiffs instituted the present action for the recovery of Rs. 3,553-14-6 as damages for failure of the defendants to deliver the goods in terms of the contract. The defendants resisted the claim substantially on the ground that the contract became void when war broke out on the 4th August 1914. Mr. Justice Chaudhuri has overruled this contention and has given the plaintiffs a decree for damages, which he has assessed at Rs. 2,500. On the present appeal, the defendants have reiterated the ground which they urged unsuccessfully in the Court below to enable them to escape from liability under the contract. The solution of the question raised clearly depends upon the nature of the contract and the effect thereon of well-established legal principles,

MADHORAM HURDEODASS v. G. C. SETT.

The agreement between the parties constitutes what is known as a C. I. F. or C. F. I. (cost, freight and insurance) contract, subject to an important variation. The rights and liabilities of the parties to a C. I. F. contract were formulated by Hamilton, J., in Biddell Brothers v. Clemens Horst Company (2), in the following terms, which were approved by Kennedy, L. J., in his celebrated dissentient judgment in the Court of Appeal, Biddell Brothers v. Clemens Horst Company (3), which was upheld by the House of Lords and characterised by Lord Loreburn, L. C., as a remarkable judgment illuminating the whole field of controversy, Clemens Horst & Company v. Biddell Brothers (4): "A seller under a contract of sale containing such terms has, firstly, to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract; secondly, to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract; thirdly, to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade which will be available for the benefit of the buyer; fourthly, to make out an invoice as described by Blackburn, J., in Ireland v. Livingstone (5), or in some similar form; and finally, to tender these documents to the buyer, so that he may know what freight he has to pay and obtain delivery of the goods, if they arrive, or recover for their loss if they are lost on the voyage. Such terms constitute an agreement that the delivery of the goods, provided they are in conformity with the contract, shall be delivery on board ship at the port of shipment. It follows that, against tender of these documents, the Bill of Lading, Invoice and Policy of Insurance, which completes delivery in accordance with that agreement, the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price." [See also Houlder v. Public Works Commissioners (6).] In the case before us, there was this departure from the normal incidents of a C. I. F.

contract that the payment was to be made, not against the documents, but forty-eight days after the goods had been landed. It follows accordingly that the defendants were under no obligation to hand over the documents to the plaintiffs immediately on receipt thereof; they could tender the documents on arrival of the goods or might take delivery themselves and make over the goods to the plaintiffs. The defendants argue that, in these circumstances, the contract became void on the 4th August 1914, inasmuch as, on that date, one essential element thereof, namely, the contract of affreightment, became unlawful by reason of the outbreak of the war and consequently void. This contention raises the question of the effect of the outbreak of war on an executory contract made with an alien enemy before the war. Such a contract is avoided or dissolved by the outbreak of war, if it enures to the aid of the enemy [Furtado v. Rogers (7)] or if it is in its nature incapable of suspension [Griswold v. Waddington (8)]. A contract is deemed in its nature incapable of suspension if its proper performance necessitates intercourse with the enemy during the war [Esposito v. Bowden (1) The William Bagaley v. United State (9)] or where time is of the essence of the contract, or the parties cannot, on conclusion of peace, be made equal [New York Life Insurance Co. v. Statham (10), Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines Limited (11)]. The principle which underlies this doctrine is best stated in the words of Lord Tenterden quoted by Willes, J., in Esposito v. Bowden (1): "Another general rule of law furnishes a dissolution of these contracts" (i. e., for the carriage of goods in merchant ships) "by matter extrinsic. If an agreement be made to do an act lawful at the time of such agreement, but afterwards, and before the performance of the act, the performance be rendered unlawful by the Government of the country, the agreement is absolutely dissolved. If, therefore, before the commencement of a voyage, war or hostilities should take place between the State to which the ship or cargo belongs and that to which they are destined, or commerce between them be wholly prohibited, the contract for conveyance is at an end, the merchant must unload his goods, and the owners find another employment for their ship, and probably the same principles would apply to the same events happening after the commencement and before the completion of the voyage." Chancellor Kent adopts the same conclusion, for the reason that war, making performance unlawful or impossible either before or after its commencement, dissolves the contract of affreightment. "The contract of affreightment may be dissolved without execution, not only by the act of the parties, but in many cases, by the act of the law. If the voyage becomes unlawful or impossible to be performed, or if it be broken up, either before or after it has actually commenced, by war or interdiction of commerce with the place of destination, the contract is dissolved. There is no difference in principle between a complete interdiction of commerce, which prevents the entry of the vessel, or a partial one, in relation to the merchandise on board, which prevents it being landed. The contract of affreightment in respect to the goods is dissolved, for the shipper cannot demand the delivery of the goods if the landing of them would expose the vessel to seizure. And if the voyage be broken up by capture on the passage, so as to cause a complete defeasance of the undertaking, the contract is dissolved, notwithstanding a subsequent recapture." (Commentaries, Volume III, page 248. See also Volume I, page 66. The contrary rule seems to have been formulated in the French Code de Commerce, sections 276, 277). This was recognised in Avery v. Bowden (12), which shews that a contract of affreightment may at once become void by the declaration of war. [See note to Clemontson v. Blessing (13).]

The doctrine that a contract entered into before war is dissolved by the outbreak of war, when its performance would involve "trading with the enemy", has been recognised in the recent cases of Duncan Fox & Co v. Schremppft & Bonke (14), Arnhold Karberg & Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain & Co. (15) and The Parcheni (16), and an instructive application is furnished by the decision in Nissim Isaac Bekhor v. Sultanalli Snustary (17), which further adopts the view taken in Groom v. Barber (18), that the seller is not bound, in a C. I. F. contract, to provide the purchaser with a policy covering war risks. The decision in In re Weiss & Co.; Weiss & Co., Ltd. v. Credit Colonial et Commerical, Antwerp (19) is not in conflict with the principle already enunciated, and is clearly distinguishable on the ground that the goods had been captured by the enemy before tender of the documents. I see no escape from the position, in the case before us, that the contract of affreightment was dissolved on the date of the outbreak of the war as the sellers could not thereafter insist on its performance by an alien enemy. In this view, the conclusion is inevitable that the contract for supply of goods also became void on that date.

The plaintiffs contend, however, that no question of the complete execution of the contract of affreightment properly arises in this case, inasmuch as the goods were in fact ultimately brought to their destination by ss. "Steinturn". This argument is obviously fallacious. The substance of the matter is that the goods were not and could not be carried to the port of destination under the original contract of affreightment. This is manifest from the proceedings in the Prize Court. The ship and cargo were seized, and although the ship alone was condemned while the cargo was released, the release was conditional on the payment of freight and charges as determined by the Prize Court. That the cargo was properly released is clear from the decision in In re Cargo, Ex. ss. Rappenfels (20), as the 'property in the cargo had at the time of capture vested in the consignees, British subjects [see the observations of Kennedy, L. J., in Biddell Brothers v. Clemens Horst Co. (3)]; but it is equally clear that the Prize Court and the Prize Court alone had jurisdiction to determine the question of freight and the conditions whereon the cargo should be released [The Corsican Prince (21)]. As explained by Sir Samuel Evans, the Prize Court deals with such claims in accordance with the Law of Nations and upon equitable principles freed from contracts, which almost always cease to have effect upon capture or seizure, by reason of the non-appearance or non-completion of the contract of affreightment; it may, indeed, discard the contract rate altogether even as a basis for assessment or calculation [The Twilling Riget (22)]. It is further indisputable that where the ship is condemned but the goods released, the Crown is entitled to impose the payment of freight as a condition of their release and has a lien on them till it is paid [The Fortuna (23), The Diana (24), The Vrow Anna Catharina (25), The Vrow Henrietta (26), The Roland (27), The Parchim (26)]. Consequently, the fact that the goods were brought to Calcutta ultimately by ss. "Steinturn" is of no assistance to the plaintiffs: it was essentially a new voyage under new conditions; it was in no sense a continuation of the original voyage in fulfilment of the contract of affreightment, in the language of Chancellor Kent, that voyage was broken up by capture so as to cause a complete defeasance of the undertaking. The original Bills of Lading would be of no avail whatever, unless the consignee complied with the conditions imposed by the Prize Court; they would be useful for identification of the consignee in whose favour the Prize Court had decided to release the goods, but they had ceased to be operative legal documents, and delivery on their basis could not be claimed as a matter of right. I hold accordingly that the contract of affreightment and therewith the C. I. F.

contract of sale became void on the 4th August 1914. Consequently, the rights and liabilities of the parties thereafter must be determined with reference to the second paragraph of section 56 of the Indian Contract Act. That paragraph, so far as it applies to the present case, provides that a contract to do an act which, after the contract is made, becomes unlawful by reason of some event which the promiser could not prevent, becomes void when the act becomes unlawful. As pointed out in Karl Ettlinger v. Chagandas & Co. (28), this provision deals with a case where the act to be done was at the time the contract was made lawful but a legal prohibition has supervened before the performance of the contract. In such a case, the contract becomes void, and no question of damages for breach thereof arises. The plain language of section 56 thus renders unnecessary a discussion of the refined distinctions observed in English Law in cases of impossibility of performance, as illustrated by the recent decisions in Horlock v. Beal (29) and Tomplin Steamship Co. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Co. (30). From this standpoint, the correspondence between the parties as to the delivery of the goods is of no assistance to the plaintiffs. The defendants no doubt, at one stage, offered to deliver the goods to the plaintiffs on certain terms, on the assumption that the contract was then in full operation. The proposed terms, however, were not accepted; there was thus no new agreement, nor did the principle of estoppel become applicable, as the plaintiffs are not shown to have altered their position in any manner by reliance on the conduct of the defendants. The claim of the plaintiffs is thus based on an alleged breach of an agreement which had become void long before the date when the breach is said to have taken place. In my opinion, such a claim cannot be sustained.

On these grounds, I agree that this appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

RAMBUX—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 22, 23, 24, scope of—Transfer of case to Court not subordinate to same High Court, whether competent.

Section 24, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is exhaustive of the judicial power to transfer suits, and no Court has jurisdiction to transfer any suit from one Court to another unless both Courts are subordinate to it. [p. 393, col. 2.]

Even where a High Court has power to declare whether or not a suit shall proceed in a Court subordinate to it, it has no power to compel its institution in any Court beyond its jurisdiction. [p. 395, col. 1.]

The transfer of a suit from one Court to another is something entirely different in character and legal effect from making an order for the return of a plaint by one Court with a view to its being presented in another. [p. 394, col. 2.]

The Hon'ble Mr. M. V. Joshi and Mr. V. V. Chitole, for the Applicants.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff Rambux carries on business at Khamgaon in West Berar. The defendants are a firm carrying on business in Bombay, where the defendants constituting the firm personally reside. The defendants have acted as commission agents of the plaintiff, and it is said that the business was this that the plaintiff was to buy cotton, have it ginned and pressed into bales at Khamgaon, and then consign it to the defendants who were to sell it for him in Bombay. According to the defendants, who are the applicants before me, this business, carried on partly in Khamgaon and partly in Bombay, resulted in Rs. 4,123-4-3 being due to them by Rambux in Sambat 1970 (1913-14 A. D.) and to a balance of Rs. 41-2-9 against him in Sambat 1971 (1914-15 A. D.)

On the 13th July 1916, Rambux filed a suit against the defendants in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Khamgaon, claiming Rs. 5,000 as due to him. The defendants have raised a plea that the Subordinate Judge has no jurisdiction and the plea has been disallowed. Before me it is conceded that the Khamgaon Court has jurisdiction over the plaintiff's suit, but an application is now made with the object of obtaining a transfer of the suit to the Bombay High Court on its original side. The application purports to be made under section 23 (3) of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, as applied to Berar.

Having heard the applicants, I am of opinion—

(1) that I have no power to direct any transfer of a suit to any Court not subordinate to this Court:

(2) that even though I may have power to declare whether or not the suit in this case shall proceed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Khamgaon, I have no power to compel its institution in any Court beyond my jurisdiction: and

(3) that no sufficient ground is made out for a declaration that the suit shall not proceed in the Khamgaon Court.

Sections 22 and 23 of the above Code lay down the procedure to be followed where a suit may be instituted in more than one Court, and the power of the Court to which application is made is limited to a power to 'determine in which of the several Courts having jurisdiction the suit shall proceed.' Section 24 of the same Code is exhaustive of the judicial power to transfer suits, and no Court is given jurisdiction to transfer any suit from one Court to another, unless both such Courts are subordinate to it. Section 25 deals with a special case of transfer by the Governor-General in Council with which we have no concern here, since this is not the case of a suit "pending in a High Court presided over by a single Judge." Thus it is clear that no order could be made by this Court directing the transfer of the suit from the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Khamgaon to any Court in the Presidency of Bombay, and least of all to the Bombay High Court itself.

Then, as regards the power under sections 22 and 23 (3), the law seems to be singularly inapt and inconclusive. The marginal heading to section 22 describes it as giving a power to transfer suits which may be instituted in more than one Court, but this is clearly misleading in respect of cases where the several Courts are not subordinate to the same jurisdiction. It seems expedient, therefore, to reproduce section 22, and to consider it in the light of the connected section 23. Section 22 is in these terms:—

“Where a suit may be instituted in any one of two or more Courts and is instituted in one of such Courts, any defendant, after notice to the other parties, may, at the earliest possible opportunity and in all cases where issues are settled at or before such settlement, apply to have the suit transferred to another Court, and the Court to which such application is made, after considering the objections of the other parties (if any), shall determine in which of the several Courts having jurisdiction the suit shall proceed.”

It will be seen that no express power is given in this section to make the transfer. The Court to which application is made is required to select one of the several Courts having jurisdiction. But when, as a result of that selection falling on a Court other than that in which the suit has been instituted, a transfer becomes necessary, then the Court must proceed under section 24.

Section 23 indicates under three heads the Court to which an application under section 22 is to be made. (1) Where the several Courts are subordinate to the same Appellate Court, the application goes before the latter; (2) where the several Courts are subordinate to different Appellate Courts but to the same High Court, the application must go to the High Court; and (3) where the several Courts having jurisdiction over the suit are subordinate to different High Courts, the application must be made to the High Court having authority over the Court in which the suit has been instituted. In the first two of these cases, the Court empowered to decide under section 22 also has jurisdiction to transfer under section 24. But in the third case there is no power of transfer, and the question is whether section 22, under which the application to be made is one for transfer, can be interpreted to mean that, in a case like the present, the Court to which the application is made, being powerless to transfer, may nevertheless direct that the plaint be returned to the plaintiff for presentation to some Court under another provincial jurisdiction. No doubt that was a course considered possible under section 22 of the 1882 Code (between which and the present section 22 the difference is purely syntactical) by Straight and Mahmood, JJ., in Tula Ram v. Haryiwan Das (1). I do not think that the law is made any clearer by the fact that what was once a separate section (24 in the 1882 Code) has now been made a part of section 23 of the present Code. Indeed, it has only added to the confusion: for section 23 deals with applications for transfer under section 22, and, in connection with sub-section (3), such an application becomes an absurdity, since no High Court can order a transfer into the jurisdiction of another High Court. The device, under Act VIII of 1859, by which such transfers were made subject to an agreement among the High Courts concerned, was not reproduced in the Codes of 1877 and 1882. Apparently there are reasons why a power of transfer, similar to that given to the Governor-General in Council under section 527 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, should not be incorporated in the Code of Civil Procedure, except to the very limited extent enacted by section 24, which applies only to cases pending in a High Court presided over by a single Judge, e. g., the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of the N.-W. F. Province, or of Chota Nagpur. The result is that, in dealing with transfers of suits, the Legislature has reached an impasse or cul-de-sac, and it has added sub-section (3) for whatever it may be worth. To my mind, its value for the purposes of procedure is nil.

To transfer a suit from one Court to another is something entirely different in character and legal effect from making an order for the return of a plaint by one Court with a view to its being presented in another. A transfer can never raise a question of limitation: but a suit is only duly instituted so as to stop the running of time when the plaint is presented to the proper Court. Suppose a suit is instituted in a Central Provinces or Berar Court on the last day allowed by the Limitation Act, and, on an application made by the defendant, a decision is made by this Court that such suit should proceed in a Court in Bombay which also has jurisdiction over it. In the absence of a power of transfer this Court then orders that the plaint should be returned for presentation to the Bombay Court. When the plaint is presented to that Court the suit will be time-barred, and it does not seem right that the plaintiff should be left to the chance of saving time under section 14 of the Limitation Act.

Moreover, the decision provided for by section 22 is a decision for the immediate purpose of a transfer for which the defendant applies under that section. Where the Court has no power to transfer it seems logical to argue that it has no power to decide, notwithstanding that sub-section (3) of section 23 permits the making of a useless application. A decision by me that the suit now in question is a suit within the Original Civil Jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court and shall proceed in that Court would not bind that tribunal in any way. It may be that by implication I have power also to decide that the suit shall not proceed in the Khamgaon Court. But, while such a decision would be intelligible where, by transfer, I could find a substitute Court for the plaintiff, it becomes arbitrary and unjust where I merely refuse him access to a jurisdiction to which he is legally entitled to resort, and give him nothing in return for it. I, therefore, hold that I am not empowered under section 22 of the Code of Civil Procedure to order that the suit shall proceed in the Bombay High Court; and I seriously doubt whether I am competent to decide that the suit shall not proceed in the Khamgaon Court which has jurisdiction over it, unless I can send the suit for trial by some other competent Court subordinate to this Court.

Finally, supposing that I am competent to close the doors of the Khamgaon Court to the plaintiff after evicting him therefrom without opening the doors of another Court for him, I have to see whether the defendants have made out a case to justify me in doing so. The grounds advanced are these:—

(1) that the plaintiff has sued on the dealings of Sambat 1971 without bringing into account a cross-claim for over Rs. 4,000 which the defendants have against him in respect of the dealings of Sambat 1970;

(2) that the dispute between the parties arises mainly out of that part of the business which was transacted in Bombay;

(3) that a settlement of accounts once took place in Bombay;

(4) that the defendants' books of account and witnesses are in Bombay;

(5) that the trial can be held more conveniently in Bombay.

I can find no reason here for taking the very exceptional course asked for, even though, had transfer been permissible, I might, subject to the contentions of the plaintiff, have been disposed to order a transfer. Books can be brought to Khamgaon, witnesses can be examined on commission, and there is no reason for preferring the convenience of the defendants to that of the plaintiff.

For the above reasons the application is dismissed without notice to the other side. The suit will proceed in the Khamgaon Court.

Application dismissed.

Rai NALINAKHYA BASU Badadur
AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS
versus

Hon'ble Maharajadhiraj SIR BIJOY CHAND
MAHATAP Bahadur AND OTHERS—
DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Village Chaudkidari Act (VI B. C. of 1870), s. 51—Chowkidari Chakran lands—Putnidar, liability of, to pay additional rent.

Where there is nothing to suggest in the terms of a putni lease that in any event a larger or smaller rent is to be paid for the putni, the putnidars are not liable to pay any additional rent in respect of the chowkidari chakran lands resumed and transferred to the zemindar under section 51 of Act VI of 1870, which the putnidars have a right to hold as forming part of their putni. [p. 397, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Burdwan, dated the 25th of February 1914, modifying that of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court of that district, dated the 17th August 1912.

NALINAKHYA BASU v. BIJOY CHAND MAHATAP.

FACTS material to the report will appear from the following extracts from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court:—

"Certain chakran lands were resumed under the Chowkidari Act and settled with the zemindar, who is the Maharaja of Burdwan. The lands are in Mouza Chakta which forms a part of the putni Nispi Kella. The plaintiffs are the putnidars. It appears that after resumption there was some proposal of settling the lands with the putnidars, but it fell through and the lands were settled with the original holders of the service lands. The plaintiffs brought this suit to enforce their rights. The Subordinate Judge who tried the suit decreed it. The Maharaja of Burdwan has appealed.

It is argued that the terms of the contract are exactly the same as in the case of Girish Chandra Roy v. Hem Chandra Roy (1) and in the case of Trailakhya Nath Chowdhury v. Ramdoyal Samanta (2). The judgment of the District Judge in the latter case has been produced and it appears that the terms are the same. It does not appear, however, that it was brought to the notice of the Judges that there were two classes of chakran lands in those days.

The learned Pleader for the appellant relies on the case of Nitya Nund Hazra v. Maharajadhiraj Bejoy Chand Mohatab (3). In Banwari Mukunda Deb v. Bidha Sundar Thakur (4) the zemindar won the suit because he was in enjoyment of the chowkidars' services and had the power to appoint them. On the other hand the fact that the zemindar was entitled to appoint chowkidars was held, in the case of Girish Chandra Roy v. Hew Chandra Roy (1) quoted above, not to have created in him an interest in the lands held by the chowkidars and it was held that the putnidar was entitled to the lands. My impression is that in those days the parties as a rule were not very particular as to who had the right to appoint. In this case the zemindar reserved the right, but 16 years afterwards gave up that right cheerfully. There was no thought of any resumption proceedings. But inasmuch as the putnidar is entitled to all the lands, and inasmuch as the lands had not been excepted from the putni lease, I am of opinion that the putnidar is entitled to the lands. I am, therefore, in agreement with the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge.

As to the right of the zemindar to a share in the profits, I am of opinion that the zemindar is entitled to a share. As has been held in certain cases the putnidar cannot look upon the lands as a sort of windfall. In this case particularly all we have to go upon is that the zemindar did not reserve the chowkidari lands for himself. He reserved the right to appoint chowkidars but gave it up. There was no contemplation at the time of any resumption proceedings. There is nothing to show that the chowkidari chakran lands were taken into account when the putni was created, nor do we know of the mode in which the rent was assessed at the inception of the putni. There are no materials, however, to come to a decision on the point. There was one case in which the Judges divided the profits half and half. The Courts have to set up an arbitrary standard but since by the putni the zemindar parts with all the lands, a fairer distribution would be to give the zemindar one-third of the profits. I shall give the zemindar one-third. Rs. 138-4 annas goes to the chowkidari fund. The zemindar will get that from the plaintiffs. He will get also one-third of Rs. 138-4-0, i.e., Rs. 46-1-3 as additional rent. With this modification the appeal fails."

Babus Sarat Coomer Bose, Sajani Kanto Sinha and Biraj Mohan Majumdar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the learned District Judge of Burdwan, dated the 25th February 1914, modifying the decision of the Subordinate Judge of that place. The suit was brought for possession of certain resumed chowkidari chakran lands by the putnidars against the landlord and the persons with whom he had settled the lands after resumption. Various defences were raised in the suit, but we are not concerned with them in the present appeal. The putnidars held under a document in writing, one portion of

(1) 5 C. L. J. 28.

(2) 10 C. W. N. lxvii (67).

(3) 7 C. L. J. 593.

(4) 12 C. W. N. 459; 7 C. L. J. 439; 35 C. 346.

URMILA SUNDARI DASI v. RATI KANTA SAHA.

which, namely the kabuliat, is before the Court. Both the lower Courts have found that the resumed lands were, in fact, included in the putni lease which was granted to the plaintiffs. Under section 51 of Act VI (B. C.) of 1870, on an order for resumption being made, "such order shall operate to transfer to such zemindar the land therein mentioned subject to the amount of assessment therein mentioned and subject to all contracts theretofore made in respect of, under or by virtue of which any person other than the zemindar may have any land." That being so, the only question that arises in this appeal is whether, under the terms of the contract which created the putni, the putnidars are liable to pay any additional rent in respect of the resumed lands which both the lower Courts have found were comprised in the putni. The decisions that have been cited before us do not really assist the case at all. In those cases, the facts are not reported and we have not the terms of the contracts creating the putnis in those cases. In this case we have got to construe the contract which is before us and that construction is not assisted by the construction put upon the other leases because we have not got the terms of those leases before us. In the present case there is the finding, which we must assume to be correct, that those lands form part of the lands let out in putni. The rent is a fixed rent and there is nothing to suggest on the terms of this document that in any event a larger or smaller rent is to be paid. In fact the document expressly states that in certain events the land being rendered unfit for use for the purposes for which it was granted, the putnidars would obtain no remission of the rent. There is nothing on the terms of the contract that can possibly suggest that the landlord, in any particular event, is to get any increased rent in respect of the land that is comprised in the putni. What were the terms of the contracts in the cases referred to, we do not know. In this case it is quite clear on the terms of the contract that the landlord is not entitled to get any increased rent with respect to the property let out. That being so, we must set aside the decree of the learned

District Judge and restore the decree of the Subordinate Judge. The respondents who have appeared in this appeal must pay the costs of the appellants in this Court as well as in the proceedings in the lower Courts.

Appeal allowed.

URMILA SUNDARI DASI—

versus

RATI KANTA SAHA AND MINOR
HIRNMOY SAHA, BY HIS GUARDIAN
RATI KANTA SAHA—RESPONDENTS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), ss. 32, 43—Guardian, suspension of, effect of—Court, power of, to suspend guardian—Construction of s. 32.

The words of section 32 of the Guardians and Wards Act are wide enough to cover an order of suspension of the guardian by the Judge, as suspension is in effect a total restriction for a time of the powers of the guardian. [p. 399, col. 1.]

The suspension of a guardian for a time does not deprive the Court of power to deal with him subsequently. [p. 399, col. 1.]

Until a guardian has actually been removed or discharged, he remains a guardian even though his powers may have been curtailed and the Court has authority under the Act to pass such orders on him as are necessary for the protection of the minor's property. [p. 399, col. 1.]

Appeal against the orders of the District Judge, Nadia, dated the 16th December 1916 and 10th January 1917, respectively.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu D. N. Chakraborty, (with him Babu Baranasibasi Mukherjee), for the Appellant.—The appellant claims the estate as a legatee under her husband's Will. The adoption did not divest her interest. In the petition shewing cause why she should not be removed from guardianship, she distinctly set up her interest as a legatee with respect to her husband's estate. She said she had been in possession in her own right and not as guardian for the minor. The orders restraining her from exercising acts of possession are ultra vires. The Judge must have passed the orders under section 43, clause 1. After the Judge had suspended the guardian and she had repudiated her character as such, she was no longer subject to the jurisdiction of the Court as "a guardian appointed or declared by the Court."

The Judge in guardianship proceedings has no jurisdiction to interfere with the possession of a person claiming title to the estate. He may ask the newly appointed guardian to institute a suit for determination of the title. It is evident that the lady's brother after having succeeded in persuading her to adopt his son is now trying to turn her out of possession of her husband's estate.

Babu Ram Chandra Mazoomdar (with him Babu Upendra Narain Bagchi), for the Respondents.—The Judge had ample jurisdiction to pass the orders complained of. The guardian has not as yet been removed or discharged, she has only been suspended. Her powers would cease only by death, removal or discharge (section 41). She is, therefore, still subject to the jurisdiction of the Court and the Court can define or restrict her powers (section 32).

Babu Baranasibasi Mukherjee, in reply.—Section 32 has no application. It presupposes the continuance of guardianship. The appellant had renounced her character as guardian and claimed an independent title to the property. She has subsequently expressly prayed for a discharge and the Judge has accepted her resignation.

[BEACHCROFT, J.—The application for a discharge was subsequent to the orders complained of]

We shall be satisfied if your Lordships say that those orders have no longer any binding effect upon the appellant.

Besides, the words in section 32 "define or restrict" can only apply to taking away from the guardian some of his powers while retaining others. They cannot mean in their ordinary sense taking away all powers of the guardian and giving them to a different person, viz., the temporary guardian appointed under clause 1 of section 12. This is clear also from the context. Section 32 says that the Court can either "extend" the powers or "define and restrict", that is to say, curtail the powers. Section 12 says in so many words that the temporary guardian cannot dispossess a person in possession [vide clause 3 (b), section 12, Act VIII of 1890].

JUDGMENT.

BEACHCROFT, J.—One Haripada Shaha died in 1897. He left a Will by which he gave his widow the power to adopt. In 1907, his widow, Urmila Sundari, adopted Hiranmoy Shaha, the son of her late husband's brother. In 1911, on her own application, she was appointed guardian of the person and property of the minor. In 1916, for reasons into which it is unnecessary to enter, the District Judge called upon her to show cause why she should not be removed from the guardianship, and on the 24th July 1916, he passed an order suspending her guardianship in these words: "The guardianship of Urmila Sundari Dasi is suspended and Rati Kanta Shaha is appointed guardian provisionally."

It was alleged that in spite of this order Urmila continued to deal with the minor's property. The District Judge, therefore, on the 16th December passed an order issuing a notice to her, warning her against realising rents from the tenants of the minor as her guardianship had been suspended. He also had a notice put in the local paper warning the tenants not to pay rent to her gomastas. He added that the present proceeding would be confined to a consideration of the fitness of Urmila for guardianship. Apparently a further complaint was made against her and on the 10th January of this year, the Judge passed another order restraining her from the acts alleged against her and ordering her not to interfere with the realisation of rents from the minor's tenants.

The present appeal is lodged against these two orders of the 16th December and 10th January. There is also a Rule for setting aside the same orders in case it is held that there is no right of appeal.

The only argument which has been addressed to us is that, in view of the learned Judge's order suspending the widow from acting as guardian, the Court had no jurisdiction to pass the orders complained of, which orders, it is suggested, must have been passed under section 43 of the Act, and could only be passed against the widow on the footing that she continued to be the guardian. In reply it was suggested that the Court has inherent jurisdiction to pass any orders which would be for the protection of the interests of the minor, irrespective of the actual terms of the Statute. And though the appellant did not attack the order of suspension, for which order the Act does not in specific terms provide, it was suggested that that order also could have been passed in the exercise of the Court's inherent powers. It was further argued that the Court's jurisdiction over the guardian did not cease until the discharge of the guardian.

It seems to me that it is not necessary to invoke the inherent jurisdiction of the Court in this case, for I am of opinion that the words of section 32 are wide enough to cover the Judge's order of suspension. That section provides that "the Court may from time to time, by order, define, restrict or extend his (i. e., the guardian's) powers with respect to the property of the ward in such manner and to such extent as it may consider to be for the advantage of the ward and consistent with the law to which the ward is subject."

The order of suspension of the guardian seems to me to be covered by these words, for suspension is in effect a total restriction for a time of the powers of the guardian.

Then it seems to me impossible to hold that the effect of such a restriction of the guardian's powers is to deprive the Court of power to deal with the guardian. Until the guardian has actually been removed or discharged, he remains the guardian even though his power may have been curtailed and the Court has authority under the Act to pass such orders as are necessary for the protection of the minor's property. The orders of 16th December and 10th January may be looked upon as enforcing in detail the order of suspension. Whether they were passed under section 32 or under section 43 is immaterial: so far as they dealt with the minor's property they were clearly within the competence of the Judge to make.

It is unnecessary to consider the question of the guardian's subsequent resignation in this proceeding. Indeed it would be out of place to do so.

This appeal, in my opinion, ought to be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

The Rule is discharged. We allow no ex parte costs.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed; Rule discharged.

SUGHRA BEGAM—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—

versus

LACHHMI NARAIN, MINOR, UNDER THE GUARDIANSHIP OF Musammam INDRANI AND ANOTHER—DECREE-HOLDERS—RESPONDENTS.

Execution—Pardanashin lady—Fraudulent conduct.

The mere fact that a judgment-debtor, who is a pardanashin lady, keeps her door closed is per se no evidence at all of fraudulent conduct on her part, unless there is anything to show that she deliberately does so or attempts to do so against the executing officer. [p. 400, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the Additional Judge, Lucknow, dated the 12th September 1916, upholding that of the Subordinate Judge, Lucknow, dated the 26th May 1916.

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, for the Appellant.

Babus Salig Ram and Hari Kishen Dhaon, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question to be determined in this case is whether it has been proved that the appellant judgment-debtor, Musammam Sughra Begam, prevented by fraud the execution of a money-decree against her held by the respondent Lachhmi Narain.

The question arose in connection with an application for execution made more than twelve years after the date of the decree. The decree-holder alleged that the judgment-debtor had rendered previous applications for execution, eleven in number, infructuous by conduct amounting to fraud.

The fraud alleged was (1) that Musammam Sughra Begam kept the door of her house shut against the process-servers who went to attach her property, and (2) that she had dishonestly removed her property so as to put it beyond the reach of any process of attachment.

The burden of proving fraud lay upon the decree-holder and the point to be decided is whether or not that burden was discharged. Both the Courts below have found that fraud was committed: the argument in second appeal is that there is no evidence to support the finding. The only direct evidence in the case consists of the deposition of a process-server, Ram Dulare, the substance of whose statement is that having on three or four occasions been entrusted with warrants of attachment, he went to the judgment debtor's house and found the door closed. He admits that he was able to get it opened with the assistance of some man who used to sit outside and whom he at first described a servant of the judgment debtor. He had to admit, however, in cross-examination that he was unable to say whether the man was a servant or not. He further deposes, though his statement is very vague in this respect, that since the enactment of the present Civil Procedure Code which authorises the breaking open of an outer door for the purpose of attaching property he has always found the lady's door open when he has gone to execute the decree. A further statement he makes is that when he has gained admittance to the premises he has never found any property worth taking, only a few beds, earthen vessels and tin utensils.

As for the circumstantial evidence all we have is that nine out of eleven attempts to execute prior to the present one have been fruitless: the door seems on most occasions to have been found closed according to the returns made by the executing officer.

The only other circumstance to be mentioned is that the lady, as a wasiqadar, is entitled to a monthly pension of Rs. 200. I am not prepared on these materials to hold that there is any proof of conduct on the part of the judgment-debtor amounting to fraud. The fact that she keeps her door closed is per se no evidence at all of fraudulent conduct. That is conduct which would be perfectly natural in the case of a pardanashin woman living in a city like Lucknow and is quite consistent with the theory that she is an honest woman, a presumption to which she is entitled in law. There is nothing at all to show that she deliberately closed her door or attempted to keep it closed against the executing officer: on the contrary Ram Dulare's statement, the only direct evidence in the case, goes to show that he could always manage to get the door opened.

Then it is said by the lower Courts that the judgment-debtor is a woman of means (she is entitled to draw Rs. 200 a month) and that it necessarily follows that if she lives in the state of squalor represented by the possession of a charpoy or two and a few cheap pots and pans, she must be dishonest and must have concealed property so as to keep it out of the reach of the law. I am not prepared to allow that this is the necessary, or even a valid, conclusion to be drawn from the circumstantial evidence. She may, if she actually receives this allowance, choose to live in a poor way—many people similarly situated do live in a miserly manner or more probably, as was stated on her behalf, she receives very little of the allowance which is drawn for her by a so-called mukhtar. All I need say is that such evidence as on the record tends neither way: the woman may be dishonest but the evidence does not prove that.

I hold that there is no evidence to support the finding that Sughra Begam has committed fraud in order to keep the respondent out of his money.

I allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Courts below and direct that the application for execution be dismissed with costs.

The appellant is entitled to her costs both here and in the lower Appellate Court.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, r. 13—Suit against principal and surety—Decree ex parte against principal whether can be set aside without discharging surety—Plaintiff withdrawing suit against principal, effect of.

A decree was passed against a principal debtor and his surety, the decree being ex parte against the principal debtor. He thereupon applied to have the decree set aside. Plaintiff consented to have his suit against the principal debtor dismissed on condition that he was allowed to execute his decree against the surety. The Small Cause Court Judge passed an order in these terms:

Held, (1) that the Judge was in error in setting aside the decree against the principal debtor without setting it aside against the surety as well; [p. 401, col. 2.]

MUNSHI RAM v. MALAVA RAM.

(2) that the plaintiff having withdrawn his suit against the principal debtor, his suit against the surety was liable to be dismissed. [p. 401, col. 2.]

Maung Pyo Tha v. Ko Min Pyu, 1 L. B. R. 150, followed.

Nathabai Tricamlal v. Ranchodlal Ramji, 27 Ind. Cas. 165; 39 B. 52; 16 Bom. L. R. 696, distinguished.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, for revision of the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Lahore, dated the 27th April 1916, decreeing the claim.

FACTS.—Plaintiff brought a suit for Rs. 550, on the basis of an agreement. Narinjan Das defendant No. 1 was the principal debtor, and Munshi Ram defendant No. 2 was the surety. On the day of hearing the principal debtor did not appear, and the surety pleaded payment. The Court passed a decree for Rs. 550, the decree being ex parte against Narinjan Das defendant No. 1.

Defendant No. 1 then made an application to have the ex parte decree set aside. Plaintiffs agreed to the ex parte decree being set aside and the suit against defendant No. 1 being dismissed, on the condition that he was allowed to execute the decree against defendant No. 2. The Small Cause Court Judge decided that the decree in favour of the plaintiff still subsisted and was capable of execution against defendant No. 2 and dismissed the plaintiff's suit as against defendant No. 1. Defendant No. 2 applied to the Chief Court in revision.

Mian Haq Nawaz (with him Lala Amar Nath), for the Petitioner.—The decree against both the defendants was a joint decree. When it was set aside against the principal debtor it ceased to be operative against the surety. Further, the suit against the principal debtor having been ultimately dismissed, the surety was discharged. Section 134, Contract Act, Maung Pyo Tha v. Ko Min Pyu (1).

Mian Abdul Rashid (with him Lala Tirath Ram), for the Respondent.—The decree against the defendants was joint as well as several, and it could be set aside against one defendant without becoming inoperative against the other defendant. Order IX, rule 13, Civil Procedure Code, Sham Lal v. Sohnu Shah (2) and Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Muhammad Din (3).

(1) 1 L. B. R. 150.

A gratuitous concession to the principal debtor does not discharge the surety unless the concession amounts to a novation of contract between the creditor and the principal debtor. Section 135 to 137, Contract Act, Subramania Aiyar v. Gopala Aiyar (4), Ranjit Singh v. Naubat (5).

Besides the plaintiff consented to have his suit dismissed against defendant No. 1 conditionally. If that condition was not fulfilled, this Court should remand the case allowing the plaintiff to proceed against both the defendants.

JUDGMENT.—After hearing Counsel for the parties, I am of opinion that the Judge, Small Cause Court, was in error in setting aside the decree, dated the 27th April 1916, against Narinjan Das alone without setting it aside against Munshi Ram also. The decree passed in this case appears to me to fall within the purview of the proviso to rule 13 of Order IX of the Civil Procedure Code, which is to the effect that where the decree is of such a nature that it cannot be set aside as against one defendant (who applies to have it set aside) only, it may be set aside against all or any of the other defendants also. This proviso embodies the principle laid down in Mahomed Hamidulla v. Tohurennissa Bibi (6).

Further, it seems to me that since the plaintiff, after the ex parte decree against Narinjan Das had been set aside by order dated the 26th June 1916, withdrew his suit against Narinjan Das, who was the principal debtor, his suit was liable to be dismissed not merely against Narinjan Das but also against the surety, Munshi Ram. The principle applicable to this case is that laid down by the lower Burma Chief Court in the case of Maung Pyo Tha v. Ko Min Pyu (1). The decision of the Bombay High Court in Nathabai Tricamlal v. Ranchodlal Ramji (7) is clearly distinguishable from the present case, inasmuch as there the principal debtor's name was struck off and the suit dismissed against him under Order IX, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, and the plaintiff

Mortgage—Redemption—Construction of document—Possession, loss of, authorising mortgagee to claim principal with interest—Revenue to be paid by mortgagee—Profits, enjoyment of, in lieu of interest—Conduct of mortgagee—Mortgagee, position of—Ouster, period of, interest for—Excess revenue, claim for.

Under the terms of an usufructuary mortgage-deed, the mortgagee was to pay the revenue (the amount of which was mentioned in the deed) assessed on the mortgaged property and to retain the balance of the profits in lieu of interest on the mortgage-money, and was further entitled to claim his money with interest thereon at a certain specified rate immediately on a loss of possession over the property or on the accrual of any other injury. The mortgagee remained in possession for five years from the date of the mortgage, and lost possession for two years after this, but owing to no fault of the parties to the mortgage. He waited till possession was restored to him, but this time the revenue of the property was considerably enhanced. Nevertheless, he remained in possession for seventeen years, paying the enhanced revenue and enjoying the net profits of the property. Then on a redemption suit having been brought, he claimed, in addition to his mortgage-money, interest on it at the stipulated rate for the period of his dispossession, and the excess revenue that he had had to pay since the restoration of possession, together with interest thereon:

Held, that, in view of the terms of the mortgage-deed and the conduct of the mortgagee, he was entitled to interest on his mortgage-money for the period of his ouster, but only at a reasonable, and not at the stipulated, rate; and that he was not entitled to the excess revenue paid by him, nor to any interest on the same. JUDGMENT.—The three plaintiffs, two of whom are appellants in this Court, were given a permanent, heritable and transferable lease of certain property in consideration of Rs. 3,200 in 1913. In this property the lessor had under-proprietary rights. Rupees 2,400 of this sum was left with them to discharge a mortgage, usufructuary, of 1890. The plaintiffs deposited Rs. 2,400 under section 83, Transfer of Property Act, but the money was not accepted. They then instituted the suit for redemption out of which this appeal has arisen.

It is admitted that for two years, from 1895 to 1897, the land became kurk tahsil owing to no fault of any of the parties to this suit, and that the mortgagees were, for those two years, out of possession.

It is admitted that by the terms of the mortgage-deed, the mortgagees were to pay the revenue to the superior proprietors, and to retain the balance of the profits in lieu of interest.

It is admitted that the amount to be so paid was originally Rs. 68 which was set out in the mortgage-deed: and that from 1895 that was enhanced, at a new settlement, to Rs. 110-14-7.

MAHABIR SINGH V. MATA BADAL.

The assignee of the mortgagees has claimed that they are entitled, in addition to Rs. 2,400, the original mortgage-money, to Rs. 1,152, two years' interest at 2 per cent. per month, for the period when they were out of possession; and to Rs. 2,459-12-6, which represents the sum of Rs. 42-14-7, excess revenue, paid annually to the superior proprietor, and interest thereon.

The Courts below have decreed the claim for payment of Rs. 1,152 in addition to Rs. 2,400. Hence this appeal by two of the three plaintiffs. Cross-objections have also been filed by the assignee of the mortgagees, in respect of Rs. 2,400 out of Rs. 2,459-12-6.

The question raised by the appellants is one to be dealt with, it seems to me, on the principles of justice, equity and good conscience. There is a provision in the mortgage-deed to the effect that if for any reason the mortgagees lose possession, the mortgagors will make an effort to pay the mortgage-money at once; and if they delay, the mortgagees will be entitled to recover their money, with interest at 2 per cent. per month by a suit, from the person and all the property, moveable and immoveable, of the mortgagors. There was to be, in fact, if the mortgagees took this course, no charge remaining upon any specific property. The possession of the mortgagees was ousted for two years. Neither did the mortgagors pay up, nor did the mortgagees resort to the extreme measure of calling in their money. They waited till the revenue was paid and possession restored: the mortgagees then in 1897 re-entered upon the land, and have enjoyed its profits ever since. It is sought to apply the doctrine of acquiescence as a bar to the claim of the mortgagees: but the doctrine of acquiescence surely has nothing to do with the present situation. The mortgagees could have sued and obtained a simple money-decree with 2 per cent. per. mensem interest: but they preferred to carry on as before, finding the transaction, apparently, not unprofitable: and the time when they could have sued for a simple money-decree has long passed. It may indeed be doubted whether, both parties having, in 1897, agreed to resume the position as it existed prior to 1895, the mortgagees would have been found entitled in equity to enforce the contract which gave them a right to sue for their mortgage-money. They have made no complaint, in the last seventeen years, as to their loss by dispossession. No doubt they can claim, in an account upon the mortgage, some allowance for the two distant years when their money lay unproductive. But I do not agree that 2 per cent. per month, the interest they were to receive on a prompt assertion of their claim, is a proper measure of the sum to be awarded to them. They did not look upon their loss as serious enough to call for any action: and they have retained possession for seventeen years more: and have only now put in a claim, in response to the mortgagors' claim to redeem.

In the circumstances I am of opinion that 12 per cent. per annum on the mortgage-money will be a sufficient solatium to them.

As for the cross-objections, the Courts below have refused to entertain the claim, because it is an assignee of the mortgagees who is dealing with the mortgagors, and not the mortgagees themselves. Into the correctness of this view it is unnecessary for this Court to go. Prima facie it is necessary to see what the mortgage-deed says: "We will pay the revenue, Rs. 68, to the sarkar, and will retain the balance of profits in lieu of interest as long as the mortgage lasts.....the mortgagors will have no claim for profits, nor shall we have any claim for interest."

Reading this as a whole and considering the attendant circumstances, I have no doubt that it provides that the mortgagees shall enjoy net profits in lieu of interest. I do not think the reference to Rs. 68 is a considered reference to a specific sum of money, which, and no more, is to be paid to the sarkar. Had that been so, it would have been expected that the amount to be paid would have been given a prominent position and not thrown in, in brackets, so to speak; and also that there would have been some provision to meet an addition to, or reduction of, that amount. The mortgage-deed provided for an immediate claim for the mortgage-money, not only on a loss of possession but on the accrual of any injury. An increase of over 50 per cent. in the sum to be paid annually as revenue would surely be an injury to the mortgagees. But for seventeen years they have been paying without a word, year by year. The increased revenue, it will be remembered, was payable at the time when possession was surrendered by the Deputy Commissioner in 1897, but the mortgagees cheerfully accepted the new burden, when they had the option of getting back their whole mortgage-money with heavy interest.

I have no doubt that not only did the mortgage-deed provide that the mortgagees were to enjoy the net profits after payment of the revenue, but that the mortgagees understood this well, and have been paying it accordingly.

I, therefore, dismiss the cross-objections.

I allow the appeal to the extent of Rs. 576 and reduce the amount decreed by the Courts below from Rs. 3,552 to Rs. 2,976 with proportionate costs. Three months' time is given. In the circumstances the parties may bear their own costs in this Court.

Appeal partly allowed.

Mortgage, usufructuary—Redemption—Hypothecation by way of simple mortgage—Limitation.

An usufructuary mortgage was executed in February 1891 and in September of the same year a further advance was made by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the security of the same property, which was hypothecated by way of simple mortgage with a further covenant that the simple mortgage should be paid off before the redemption of the usufructuary one. The plaintiff claimed to redeem the usufructuary mortgage without paying any sum due under the simple mortgage of September 1891:

Held, that as a suit on the mortgage-deed of September 1891 would be barred, the plaintiff was entitled to redeem the usufructuary mortgage without paying off the simple mortgage. [p. 404, col. 2, p. 405, col. 1.]

Dr. S. N. Sen and Mr. P. L. Banerji, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Gokul Prasad and Lakshmi Narain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit for redemption. The memorandum of appeal purports to raise two substantial points; but one of these, namely, that relating to the sum payable under a decree of the 9th of December 1892, is concluded by an adverse finding of fact of the lower Appellate Court. There remains only one substantial point. The mortgage sought to be redeemed is of the 28th of February 1891. On the 4th of September 1891 a further advance was made by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the security of the same property. The property in question was hypothecated by way of simple mortgage, and there was a further covenant to the effect that this simple mortgage should be paid off before the usufructuary mortgage is redeemed. The plaintiffs claim to redeem the usufructuary mortgage without paying any sum due under the simple mortgage of the 4th of September 1891. The lower Appellate Court has maintained the claim of the plaintiffs upon a line of reasoning based on the fact that a portion of the property hypothecated consisted of an occupancy holding, the transfer or alienation of which was forbidden by the law in force at the time, namely, by section 9 of Act XII of 1881. The point is an arguable one, and it does not seem altogether easy to reconcile some of the decisions of this Court which have been laid before us. The plaintiffs-respondents, however, undertake to support the decree of the Court below on a slightly different ground. The learned Counsel on behalf of the respondents says that whether the mortgage in question was of an occupancy holding or of a fixed rate holding, and whether or not the present plaintiffs are estopped from denying that it was a mortgage of a fixed rate tenancy, nevertheless the plaintiffs are entitled to redeem on payment of the debt due under the usufructuary mortgage only. This plea is based upon the fact that the mortgage-deed of the 4th of September 1891 was barred by limitation at the time when the present suit was brought, so that the mortgagee could not have maintained a suit for the recovery of any money due under the same. This contention is supported by authority of this Court, namely, the case of Kesar Kunwar v. Kashi Ram (1). One of us was a party to that decision and we are in any case not prepared to re-consider it. This rejoinder, therefore, on the part of the plaintiffs-respondents must prevail. We dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the high scale.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

PRATT, J. C.—The issue referred to the lower Court was whether on the date of the last execution application, i. e., the 11th January 1909, a valid discharge could have been given by the other joint decree holders without the concurrence of the minor, either under Hindu Law or the Law of Contract.

The lower Court has found that the discharge could not have been given under Hindu Law as the joint decree-holders were not members of an undivided Hindu family and the correctness of its decision on this point has not been questioned.

The lower Court has also found that such a discharge could have been given under the general Law of Contract.

Mr. Kimatrai seeks to question the correctness of the finding, and Mr. Wadhupal contends that he is debarred from so doing as no objections have been filed under Order XLI, rule 26. It is true that Mr. Kimatrai has no right to be heard, but his omission to file objections does not relieve us of the duty imposed upon us by Order XLI, rule 31, to give our decision on the issue: Mumtaz Begam v. Fateh Husain (1), Subbayya v. Rami Reddi (2) and the judgment of this Court in First Appeal No. 42 of 1913.

As Mr. Kimatrai's arguments will assist us in coming to our decision we have allowed him a hearing.

The issue involves the general question as to whether payment to one of several joint promisees is a complete discharge.

Section 45 of the Contract Act refers to co-promisees and section 42 to co-promisors.

Section 45 gives to all co-promisees the right to claim performance. In other words, the promisor is liable to all the co-promisees.

Section 42 makes a similar provision as to co-promisors and all co-promisors are liable to the promisee.

But section 42 is followed by section 43, which enacts that each co-promisor is

(1) 6 A. 391; A. W. N. (1884) 129; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 61.

(2) 22 M. 344; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 245.

JERAMDAS v. WADERO SHAH ALI.

also liable while there is no corresponding section following section 45 to deal with the converse case of co-promisees.

Thus if A and B promise to pay C, a payment by A alone discharges the debt. But if C promises to pay A and B there is no provision that the debt is discharged by a payment to A alone.

It seems clear that the Act does not make a payment to one co-promisee a discharge because that is not a performance of the contract. C had promised to pay A and B and a payment to A alone is not in accordance with the contract.

The only other sections of the Act which are relevant are sections 38 and 165.

The last paragraph of section 38 enacts that tender to one co-promisee has the same legal consequences as tender to all the co-promisees. Now if payment to one co-promisee were complete performance there would have been no occasion to have enacted this provision as to tender, for the tender to one would have been a complete and perfect tender. The object, therefore, seems to be a special exception in favour of an inchoate and imperfect tender. If the promisor cannot conveniently pay all the co-promisees he may relieve himself of future interest by a tender to one. If the tender is accepted it will not be a discharge and if the promisor has to pay over again he has remedy against the co-promisees he has overpaid.

Section 165 allows a bailee to deliver goods back to one of several joint bailors. Here again if the general law as to co-promisees made delivery to one equivalent to delivery to all, this section would have been redundant. It must, therefore, be intended as an exception giving a privilege available only in cases of bailment.

The English Law as to co-promisees is that payment to one is good discharge against all: Wallace v. Kelsall (3). This is, however, subject to the rule that when a person is seeking equitable relief he will not be entitled to plead such a payment—though valid in Common Law—unless it appear in fact that the co-promisees were joint tenants and not tenants-in-common Steeds v. Steeds (4) and Fowell v. Brodhurst (5). Mr. Wadhwal contends that section 38 was intended to reproduce the English Common Law rule and that the equity declared in cases subsequent to the Act, was not and could not have been present in the minds of the framers of the Act.

But the English Law affords no guide to the solution of the question, for it has been deliberately departed from in sections 42, 43 and 44 dealing with co-promisors. Moreover both sections 42 and 45 by inclusion of the representatives of deceased co-promisors and co-promisees adopt the equitable presumption of tenancy-in-common as opposed to the Common Law presumption of joint tenancy. And lastly it has recently been pointed out by the Privy Council in the case of Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (6) that the Contract Act is in some respects in advance of the English Law.

I differ from the case of Krishnarav Ramchandra v. Manaji (7), for it proceeds wholly on the English Law. The later Indian cases have been conflicting. In Mannava Annapuramma v. Uppala Akkayya (8) and in Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (9), it was held that a payment to one co-promisee was a valid discharge as against all. These cases treat section 38 as conclusive of the law as to performance. Sankaran Nair, J., said at page 549 of the former case:—

“It is difficult to impute an intention to the Legislature that the promisor was entitled to make the offer though the promisee was not entitled to accept it. It seems clear that if the promisor was entitled to offer payment to one of the promisees which the latter was entitled to accept, the promisor cannot be held to be liable to pay over again to the other promisees what he has already paid."

I see no such difficulty. Section 38 deals with tender, that is, with attempted performance. But if the offer is accepted why should the promisor not pay one co-promisee and so save interest running? If he has to pay over again he has a right of recovery from the promisee he paid in the first instance. If this paragraph of section 38 was intended to enact the law as to performance between a promisor and several co promisees, surely its place would have been after section 45. I concur in the conclusion arrived at in the dissenting judgment of the Chief Justice in Mannava Annapurnamma v. Uppala Akkayya (8) and in the cases of Ramaswamy v. Muniandy Servai (10) and Husainara Begum v. Rahmannessa Begum (11).

I am, therefore, of opinion that a valid discharge cannot be given under the Law of Contract by one of several co-promisees; and decide that in this case a valid discharge could not have been given without the concurrence of the minor.

The application is, therefore, not time-barred except as to instalments payable more than twelve years previously. This amount in time is found by the lower Court to be Rs. 8,109-17 and this finding is not challenged.

We reverse the order of the lower Court and direct execution to proceed for the above amount. Appeal allowed. No order as to costs.

ABDUL RAHMAN AND ANOTHER—

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

*Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 2. (11)—
Legal representatives, suit against—Estate not in hands of legal representatives, effect of.*

A suit against the legal representatives of a deceased debtor should not be dismissed on the mere ground that the defendants are not in possession of any portion of the estate left by the deceased. [p. 408, col. 1.]

Civil revision against the order of the Additional Munsif, Judge, Small Cause Court, Dehra Dun, dated the 13th October 1916.

FACTS of this case are as follows:—

One Abdul Khalik executed a bond for Rs. 114 in favour of the plaintiff-appellant Shankar Lal. He died after the execution of the bond. The plaintiff then instituted a suit on his bond against Musammam Mahammadi and Abdul Rahman, the widow and son of Abdul Khalik, deceased, on the allegation that the defendants were the legal representatives of Abdul Khalik and were in possession of the assets of the deceased and thus liable for the debt. The defendants denied the execution of the bond and receipt of any assets of the deceased. The Court of Small Causes, Dehra Dun, dismissed the suit and delivered the following judgment:—

(1) It is proved that the bond in suit was executed by Abdul Khalik. I, therefore, decide the issue in the plaintiff's favour.

(2) It is not satisfactorily proved that any assets came in the hands of the defendants, or that they are likely to come in their hand. They are, therefore, not liable to the plaintiff. Suit dismissed with costs. Defendants to get their costs.

From this judgment and decree the plaintiff came to the High Court in revision.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Applicant, submitted that the Court acted illegally in dismissing the plaintiff's suit. It was admitted that the defendants were the legal representatives of Abdul Khalik. The execution of the bond was duly proved against them.

DANESH MOLLA v. DHANANJOY BISWAS.

The Court, therefore, should have passed a decree in plaintiff's favour. The decree should have been for payment of money out of the assets of Abdul Khalik and if the plaintiff could prove that the defendants had any assets, he would realise his decree. It was not for this Court to decide the question of assets. There was a very old ruling which supported this contention. He referred to Madho Ram v. Delbur Mahul (1), which was on all fours with the present case.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Respondents, submitted that it had not been held in the case that consideration passed on the execution of the bond. The Court below had held that there was no satisfactory proof that any assets came to the hands of the defendants. Under these circumstances they were not liable for the debt. He referred to Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (2) in support of his contention.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, in reply, submitted that the ruling referred to by the Counsel for the respondent really supported him. He referred to the same case [viz., Jafri Begam v. Amir Muhammad Khan (2)] and said that the case reported as Madho Ram v. Dilbur Mahul (1) had been followed here.

JUDGMENT.—The Court of Small Causes at Dehra Dun should have followed the case of Madho Ram v. Dilbur Mahul (1). The decree of the Court below is set aside. The case will be returned to the Munsif of Dehra Dun, who will place it upon his file of pending suits and dispose of it according to law. Costs will follow the event.
